THE GROTESQUES

Introduction

THE articles contained in this volume originally appeared in the review La France littéraire, of which Charles Malo was the editor. It was in December, 1833, that Gautier signed a contract with Malo to furnish him with twelve articles which should together form a complete account of the old French poets. The title agreed upon — Exhumations littéraires — indicates that the authors to be treated of were every one of them forgotten. Eleven years later the essays were collected and republished in book form, the last one, that on Paul Scarron, having but just before made its appearance in the pages of the Revue des Deux Mondes. This first edition was in two volumes octavo, and contained twelve papers; the Charpentier edition contains ten only. Of these the most characteristic have been translated here.

The title selected in the beginning was not adhered to when the work appeared in book form, being changed to Les Grotesques, which it has ever since retained. It is a striking title, but it does not accurately describe the contents of the volume, or even the majority of the authors treated of by the critic; for no student of literature nowadays would dream of calling that great poet, Villon, a grotesque; and Théophile de Viau, while infinitely less great than Villon, is also a writer of mark, as indeed Gautier himself has been careful to point out. Cyrano de Bergerac is absurd and extravagant very often, but not absolutely grotesque in the true sense of the word. To have called him burlesque and to have applied the same epithet to Scarron and Scudéry would have been justifiable, but the expression "burlesque" did not convey any peculiar meaning in 1833, while "grotesque" did, and awakened recollections, still very vivid, of the most radical portions of the Romanticist profession of faith.

It was in 1827 that Victor Hugo — already famous and already recognised as the head of the new school that was merrily and noisily attacking the strongholds in which the Classicists were intrenched — published his drama "Cromwell." The play itself could not be performed, owing to its great length, apart from a certain lack of appropriateness to other exigencies of the stage. But the "Preface" eclipsed the play, and drew to itself the attention of both literary parties then contending for supremacy in France. It was a manifesto, — a bold declaration of principles and aims, written in a vigorous, trenchant style, sparing none of the idols of the Classicists, and setting up, with much pomp, splendour, and acclamation, new gods to be worshipped.

The most original part of the "Preface" was that bearing upon the "grotesque" and its legitimate place in art. "In modern thought," said Victor Hugo, "the grotesque plays an all-important part. It is omnipresent: on the one hand it gives birth to deformity and repulsiveness, on the other to comicality and buffoonery. It weaves innumerable novel superstitions around religion; countless picturesque inventions around poesy. The grotesque it is which scatters lavishly in air, water, earth, and fire the myriads of intermediary beings which live in the popular traditions of the Middle Ages; which sends whirling through the darkness the terrifying dance of the witches' sabbath, which provides Satan with horns, cloven hoofs, and bats' wings." And, after enthusiastically dwelling upon the æsthetic and literary value of the grotesque in art, upon the absolute necessity which exists for never omitting it from a picture intended to represent life in its real aspect, Hugo continues : “ In the new poetry, while the soul, penetrated by Christian morality, shall be represented by the sublime, the grotesque shall represent the animal side of man. The former, freed from all impure alloy, shall possess charm, grace, beauty ; for it must be capable one day of creating Juliet, Desdemona, Ophelia. The other shall take to itself the ridiculous, the weak, the ugly. In the dividing up of humanity and creation, its share shall be passions, vices, crimes ; it shall be lust, servility, gluttony, avarice, treachery, quarrelsomeness, and hypocrisy ; it shall be, in turns, Iago, Tartuffe, Basile ; Polonius, Harpagon, Bartholo ; Falstaff, Scapin, Figaro. There is but one standard of beauty ; there are innumerable forms of ugliness.” And again : “ From art it passes into manners ; and while on the one hand it makes the masses applaud the clown in the play, on the other hand it later presents kings with court-jesters ; in the very age of etiquette, it exhibits Scarron by the side of the couch of Louis XIV.”

Gautier fairly worshipped Hugo, and the “ Preface ”

had very deeply impressed him, as more than one passage in "The Grotesques" abundantly proves. These forgotten poets, then, appealed to him, partly on account of the effects which might be drawn from their works and which went to support the theory Hugo had developed, partly on account of their seeming to have been harshly and even unjustly dealt with by the great critic of the seventeenth century, Boileau; whose judgments had remained practically unquestioned until that time. Without being, perhaps, as prejudiced as his comrades in Romanticism, Gautier, nevertheless, largely shared the prevailing abhorrence of the autocrat of Parnassus, and was ready enough to exalt the forgotten poets at the expense of the critic and the school he represents so worthily and with such dignity.

But Gautier, even as a young writer and an enthusiastic Romanticist, had a literary conscience, was possessed of literary taste, and was naturally inclined to tell the truth without allowing himself to be swayed consciously by prejudice or antipathy. The result is that his work confirms, on the whole, the verdict of Boileau; and that the lack of taste, which is the most conspicuous reason of the forgetfulness which has fallen to the lot of these Grotesques, the absurdity and the extravagance of which they are frequently guilty, made him feel that any attempt to put them on a high pedestal must be fraught with failure. The one exception to this is, of course, Villon, whom the unanimous opinion of the age ranks with the other great poets of France.

But if Gautier could not and did not seek to wholly reverse the judgments of Boileau, he succeeded in making the readers of his own and of succeeding generations appreciate in these minor poets many a forgotten beauty, and in giving such vivid reproductions of the men and their times that every one, Cyrano de Bergerac, Saint-Amant, Scarron, and the others actually live in his pages. He has written criticisms keen, bright, interesting; full of brilliant passages, of evocations of bygone times, of restoration of forgotten modes of thought; he has made intelligible the fame which most of these men enjoyed in their day,—and all this without once wearying the reader, but, on the contrary, maintaining his interest and exciting his curiosity.

As his first attempt in literary criticism, “The Grotesques” would have a value of its own, but beyond the curiosity which attaches to the début of a great writer in a new field, the studies of Gautier have permanent and well recognised worth. At a time when Villon was not known as he deserved to be, the chapter on this poet did much to attract attention to him and to the deeply personal and pathetic character of a large part of his verse. Théophile de Viau was judged solely on the ridiculous couplet cited, and justly so, as an example of phenomenal bad taste, but few, if any, had the least idea that he was nevertheless a poet of great parts and of, at times, fine inspiration. That there was anything in Saint-Amant besides praise of gross feeding and hard drinking did not occur to the average reader, while Cyrano de Bergerac, to whom a modern dramatist owes his fame, was merely a big-nosed swashbuckler.

Gautier cleared up a number of misconceptions, swept away some errors, and gave a clearer view of a period in which, though it was not graced by poetic genius, there were many writers of merit and worth. He has not unsuccessfully essayed to show the causes of the admiration felt for these men; an admiration due to tastes differing from ours, to habits much unlike ours, to a state of society and a condition of manners which we can but with difficulty comprehend at the present day. And withal he had not the least intention — indeed, he expressly declares it, — to propose these authors as models to be followed by his generation. They were interesting, instructive, curious, pleasant to read, but not modern. Presenting, no doubt, many a feature which made the Romanticists — then in the zenith of their reputation and their power — akin to them in many respects, yet they did not seem to the critic worth imitating. The exquisite artistic sense which was so rapidly maturing in him, and which had dictated so many of the beautiful pages in his early and daring romance, the rich poetic feeling which was later to give the world “Enamels and Cameos,” could not possibly be satisfied with the compositions of writers who, if they possessed pearls, did not know how to turn them to account, who, if they hit upon a dramatic situation, were incapable of making adequate use of it.

Gautier pointed out — what is of common knowledge now — that Molière borrowed one of his most famous scenes from fighting Cyrano, but the very extract which he gives suffices, without reading the deadly dull “Tricked Pedant,” to show the utter inferiority of de Bergerac, the would-be dramatist, to Molière, the prince of comic writers. If he recalls de Vigny when speaking of Saint-Amant, it is not that he believes the latter equals the former as a poet, but merely to show how ideas, unworked or poorly wrought out by his "Grotesques," have reappeared, splendid and luminous, in the verse of men of genius.

Gautier is not a Sainte-Beuve, he does not equal the great critic of the nineteenth century, but he unquestionably writes very admirable criticisms and very able studies of writers and their works, in a style which Sainte-Beuve might have envied, so full of life, fire, colour, and poetry is it. To read Gautier is to enjoy a rich intellectual treat in which the senses themselves have a part.

THE study of second-rate poets is both delightful and interesting, because, first, as they are less known and read, there are more novelties to be found in them; and next, because there is not a ready-made judgment for every striking passage. One has not to go into conventional ecstasies, to be convulsed, or to start with delight at certain places, as is indispensable with poets who have become classics.

The reading of these lesser poets is unquestionably somewhat more recreative than is that of acknowledged celebrities, for it is in these second-rate poets — I think I may affirm this without indulging in a paradox — that the greatest originality and eccentricity are to be met with. Indeed, that is why they are second-rate. To be a great poet, at least in the ordinary acceptation of the words, a man must address the masses and influence them. It is only general ideas which make an impression upon the crowd. Every one likes to come accross his own thoughts in the poet's song. This explains why the stage is so hostile to the eccentricities of fancy. The most belauded passages of poets are usually commonplace. Ten lines by Byron upon love, or the short duration of life, or any other equally stale subject, will gain more admirers than the most weird visions of Jean Paul or of Hoffman. The reason is that many people have been or are in love, that many more are afraid to die, and that there are very few who have seen pass, even in their dreams, the fantastic silhouettes of the German story-tellers.

Among the second-rate poets one finds everything that the aristocrats of the Ark have disdained to make use of, — the grotesque, the fantastic, the trivial, the ignoble, the daring sally, the newly coined word, the popular proverb, the pompous metaphor; in a word, bad taste in its entirety, with its lucky hits, with its plated ware which might be gold, with its bits of glass which might be diamonds. Pearls are scarcely found elsewhere than in a dunghill, as witness Ennius. For myself, I prefer the pearls of the old Roman to all the gold of Virgil. It takes a very great heap of gold to make the worth of a small handful of pearls.

FRANÇOIS VILLON

I take singular pleasure in unearthing a fine line from the work of a despised poet. It seems to me that his unhappy shade must rejoice and be consoled at seeing his thought understood at last. I rehabilitate him, I do him justice; and if at times my praise of some obscure poet appears exaggerated to certain of my readers, let them remember that I praise these writers in order to make up for all those who have insulted them beyond reason, and that undeserved contempt provokes and justifies excessive panegyrics. When reading one of these poets — reputed poor, thanks to the judgment of a college pedant — one comes at every step upon picturesque accidents which cause a pleasant surprise. It is just as if, when travelling along a road which one has been told is white with sunshine and dust, one met here and there beautiful green trees, hedges full of flowers and songbirds, running waters, and perfumed breezes. All these things would seem the more beautiful because the less expected. A silver coin picked up in the street gives greater pleasure than a gold piece in a drawer.

Saint-Amand, Théophile, Du Bartas are full of such surprises. Their brilliant thoughts stand out more vigorously than those of other and more perfect poets, no doubt, because of the inferiority of the rest of the work; just as the night sky causes the stars, invisible at noon, to twinkle brightly.

Master François Villon, the author of "The Lesser Testament" and "The Great Testament," is — in spite of Étienne Pasquier, Antoine du Verdier, and some other pedants, in spite of the forgetfulness, or rather the desuetude, into which he has fallen because of his obsolete language and the obscurity of his allusions — the member of that numerous family in whose work one comes upon the greatest number of lucky finds of this sort; and yet, strange to tell, the poor scholar Villon is scarce known save through the two rather ridiculous verses of Boileau Despréaux, —

"Villon first managed, in these uncouth ages,
To clear up the muddled art of our old romancers."

It is likely that Boileau had not the faintest idea of what Villon was, and had not read a single line of his. Certainly the ascetic poet of His Most Christian Majesty would not have found these verses to his taste, he whose ears were so jansenistically alarmed at the sound of the cynical rimes of that bold poet Mathurin Régnier.

Villon, who, according to Boileau, cleared up the muddled art of our old romancers, did not write a single romance or anything resembling one. He is a satirical soul, a philosopher-poet, a different vein of whom Marot and Régnier have each exploited, but he is assuredly not a romancer. This distich, and two or three others of about the same value, repeated imperturbably, have become axioms, and it is by them that many persons, otherwise well informed, judge our ancient literature.

Since the publication of Boileau's "Art of Poetry," criticism has progressed a good deal. We are not so easily satisfied, and we do not settle an author's place by means of a line formulated as a proverb; but criticism commits, in our opinion, the great mistake of attaching itself only to established reputations which no one attacks. It takes account of the princes of poetry only, and troubles very little about the popular and the middle-class writers. It is like historians, who fancy they have written the history of a nation, when they have compiled the life of a prince. Assuredly Master de Scudéry has as large a place in the age

*****

of Richelieu as good Pierre Corneille. His swash-buckler style is by no means out of place by the side of the Castilian arts and chivalric fashions of the sublime author of "The Cid." The surest way to become acquainted with an epoch is to study its portraits and characters. Corneille is the portrait, Scudéry the character. No one, that I am aware of, has written Scudéry's biography or analysed his works.

But what I have just said about Scudéry in no wise applies to François Villon. Villon was the greatest poet of his time ; and now, after the lapse of so many years, after so many changes in manners and in style, through the old words, through the irregularly scanned verses, through the barbarous turns, the poet shines as the sun through the clouds, like an old painting from which the varnish has been removed.

Almost alone among all the Gothic writers Villon has any ideas. Everything is not sacrificed in his work to the exigencies of a literary form which has been purposely made difficult. He is free from those eternal descriptions of spring which flourish in ballads and fabliaux, nor does his verse consist merely of complaints of the cruelty of some fair lady who refuses to grant the favour of love. His is a new, strong, simple poetry, a good-natured muse which does not look prudish when a coarse word is spoken; which goes to the wine-shop and even elsewhere, and would not scruple to put your purse in its pocket, — for I am bound to confess it, Villon was a past master in the art of burglary, and spoke slang at least as well as French. Our poet was a jovial chap :

“ Born to be hanged, as every one could see,
But, barring that, the best of fellows he.”

His libertine, vagabond life necessarily told upon his talent, and gave it a peculiar cast ; he has indeed a distinct, unmistakable colour which distinguishes him from other poets, and he deserved that Rénier should imitate him in his magnificent satire on the brothel. The one mark which Villon has left in history is a decree by which he was condemned to be hanged with five or six good fellows of his kind. Very lucky was it for him that he did not suffer from talkativeness, as he himself says. He appealed from the sentence of the Châtelet Court to the High Court of Parliament, and the penalty was commuted into banishment pure and simple. He withdrew, so it is claimed, —

THE GROTESQUES

“ To Saint-Generou,
Near Saint-Julian-des-Vouentes,
In the marshes of Bretagne or Poictou,” where are to be found “handsome and pleasant wenches,” — an indispensable matter for a damned libertine like Villon. He led at Saint-Generou the same life as at Ruel and Paris, the ordinary scenes of his exploits. Any other man, after having shaved the gibbet so closely, would have mended his ways, but apparently Villon was incorrigible, for we find that Louis XI, on his return from Flanders, caused him, by express favour, to be released from the prison of Meung, wherein Bishop Thibault d'Aussigny had him immured for having robbed a sacristy. He had made up his mind to die, and had composed the following axiomatic epitaph in single rimes : —

“ A Frenchman I, which grieves me sore, born in Paris, near Pontoise. And now a rope a fathom long shall teach my neck my buttocks' weight.”

It will be seen that he cared little enough whether or not he was made into an earring for Mistress Gibbet. He had even rimed a beautiful ballad, in which he represents himself by anticipation as having been actually hanged with five or six of his band : —

FRANÇOIS VILLON

“Sodden’d by rains and washed are we ;
Blacken’d and dried by sun’s hot rays.
Our eyes pick’d out by pie and crow
And pluck’d each hair of head and brow,
Never for a moment still are we :
Hither and thither, with change of wind,
Driven about sans rest or stay ;
No thimble dinted as peck’d are we.
Brethren, your jeers repress, we pray,
And : God assoil ye, rather say.”

He speaks like a connoisseur ; he knows the gallows thoroughly ; and the victim thereon, in all its aspects, profile, and perspective, is singularly familiar to him. Colin de Cayeux and René de Montigny, his comrades, had been stupid enough to come to their death in their boots, as may be seen in one of the ballads of the “Jargon,” and he himself could scarcely expect to die in his bed. I fancy I can see him, thin, pale, ragged, turning around the scaffold as the point to which his life must come, and piteously contemplating his good friends, who were figuring a capital I and sticking their tongues out merely because they had gone to have some fun at Ruel. Notice the term, the euphuism of it,—have some fun ! What the devil did those people do when they were seriously at work, since they were presented with a hemp necktie simply for having had some fun? The fun of Villon was swindling, stealing, gorging in well-famed places and in others, fighting with the watch and the citizens, — nothing less could be fun for such a man. And yet in his verse he sets himself up as a counsellor of morals.

THE GROTESQUES

“ To you I speak, comrades in debauch —
Disease of souls and of the body joy —
Keep you safe from the cursed tan
That turns men black when they are dead,” says he, after an admirable homily addressed by him to all debauchees, thieves, and other nice people. Pray note, I beg you, that expression, the cursed tan that turns men black when they are dead. It is the result of close observation, and shows that the author is thoroughly up in the subject of which he treats. Besides, he puts it very politely. He does not say brutally, “ Look out and don’t get hanged ; ” he has too much self-respect for that. The piece which precedes these verses is entitled, “ A Ballad of Good Doctrine for Those of Evil Life.” We cannot resist the pleasure of transcribing it.

“ Indulgence peddler, whether you be,
Loader of dice, or gambler free,
Or counterfeit coiner, sure you ’ll be

Scalded as they in water hot.
Perjured traitors, void of faith ;
Whether you rob, plunder, or steal,
    To whom, think you, goes the profit ?
    To taverns and wenches, every whit.

“ Rime and rail, hustle and fight,
With your vicious like be day and night,
Fool that you are, hypocrite and shameless ;
Be clown and wizard, play the flute,
Perform in cities and eke in towns
Farce, or show, or moralities :
Win, if you will, at table, glic, and bowls —
    Ever 't will go — hear me tell it —
    To taverns and girls, every bit.

“ Keep far away from filth so vile :
Till the ground, the fields and meadows mow ;
Tend and groom or horse or mule,
If never you have been to school :
Enough shall you have if you take to these.
But if hemp you crush and hemp you draw,
    All your labour shall but benefit
    The girls and the taverns, every whit.

ENVOI

“ Hose and doublets full of points,
Gowns and garments of every kind,
Ere you do worse, carry them all
    To taverns and wenches, one and all.”

It will be seen that if he sins, it is not for want of knowing what is right, — but what would you have ?

“ . . . In deep poverty
(So says the popular saw)
Look not for too much loyalty.
Necessity leads to evil life
As wolf by hunger is driven from woods.”

Villon does not fail, every time the opportunity occurs, to return to this thought, and even amid all the lamentations over his wretchedness and the regrets he expresses that he has not been virtuous, he fully justifies these two verses of Mathurin, —

“ . . . Naught so punishes
A vicious man as vice itself.”

Besides, it would seem that poverty was an hereditary failing in his family.

“ Poor have I been from my youth up ;
Lonely my birth and poor :
Little wealth my sire did own,
And his sire too, Horatius hight.
For poverty has tracked and haunted us.
On graves of my forbears every one (May God to Himself their souls uptake !)
Never a crown or sceptre shows.”

He lost his father early, and it was his uncle who brought him up, and who treated him with all possible tenderness.

---

FRANÇOIS VILLON

---

“ . . . My more than father,
Master Guillaume de Villon,
More gentle to me than any mother.”

Certainly, Villon was not born to be a cut-purse; he had a fine soul, accessible to all good sentiments. Every time he speaks of his mother it is in a strain of exquisite sensibility.

“ . . . My poor mother
Who through me bitter pain did know,
God wots, and many a sad hour here below.”

He maintained three young orphans: —

“ Also, by pity moved, I leave
To three little chaps that naked be,
Named in this my present scroll,
The better known thus they may be —
Poor little orphans, of all bereft,
And naked as earthworm is :
I order that they be so furnishèd
That this winter through at least they live.”

These three orphans were Colin Laurens, Girard Gosseyn, and Jehan Marceaux. He mentions them several times.

“ Upon this trip of mine I've learned
That these three poor orphans mine
Have grown and are gaining age.

THE GROTESQUES

---

Now will I that to school they go.
Where ? To Master Peter Richer's ;
For them Donatus is too hard, I trow.

My long tabard in two I cut,
And will that half thereof be sold,
And therewithal to buy them cates,
For youth a sweet tooth ever has."

He counsels them to work, —

" Evil, for the strong, is that sweet sleep
That leads the young to ease in youth ;
So that at last they wake and work, in truth,
When they should rest as age doth creep."

Villon does not indulge too much in fine maxims. " Do what I say, not what I do." If he had been placed in other circumstances, and had used for good all the wit and all the genius which he spent for ill, there is no doubt that he would have left in history other traces than those of the decree condemning him, in due legal form, to be hanged high and close, like the wicked rascal that he was ; but mayhap we should have lost the poet if we had gained the honest man. Good poets are rarer than honest people even, although these are not very common.

Notwithstanding the lack of documents, it is easy to write a very detailed life of Villon. He is an egotist poet, and I and me recur very frequently in his verse. He speaks of himself, confesses his sins with charming artlessness, looks back upon his life, takes pleasure in the remembrances of his youth and of the good times he has had. He talks about death, about virtue, about everything; for the poor scholar invented, under Louis XI, the discursive poetic form in which Byron wrote his "Don Juan." Like the noble lord's poem, the "Testament" of the low-class thief is in octaves. The interlacing of the rimes is almost the same; there is the same mingling of seriousness and railery, of enthusiasm and of commonplace. Next to a page wet with tears comes a chaplet of absurdities and conundrums as wretched as the puns of the English nobleman; the effect produced by a suave painting is destroyed by a grotesque sketch in Callot's manner. One description leads to another. The ironical bequests follow each other uninterruptedly. To this man a ballad, to that one a rondeau, to another an old shoe or a shaving-dish; all the caprices of the most erratic fancy are to be found in the two Testaments of Villon. For there are two, the Lesser and the Great. But the point in which the two poets — placed, one at the foot of the ladder, the other at the top — most resemble each other is in the bitter disenchantment, the sad, deep glance cast upon things of this world, the regret for the past, the feeling for what is beautiful and good which survives the apparent degradation, the loss of all illusion, and the desperate melancholy which is the result thereof. Villon, because of his habitually ignoble life, mourns with less elegance than Brummel's fashionable rival, but his cry of pain, though not modulated with so much art, is none the less true and painful.

---

“In the year thirty of my age,
When deep I drank of every shame,
Not born all fool, nor yet all sage ;
Spite of much woe that to me came,
Whereof no part was spared to me
By hand of Thibault d'Aussigny.”

(It is from this passage that we learn the exact date of Villon's birth. He was born in 1431, the “Testament” having been composed in 1461.)

“Sinner am I, and know it well ;
Yet God doth not my death desire,
But that I change and righteous live ;
Plainer than any by sin attacked —
Although for sin Himself did die —
God truly sees, and His mercy great —
If conscience make me grieve for sin —
By His good grace full pardon grants.

---

“ If by my death the common weal
Could profit aught in any way,
To die the death of vilest men
Myself I'd doom, so God help me !
Harm I do not to old or young,
Whether they live or eke be dead :
Never do mountains their places change
Forward or back for a beggar's sake.

. . . . .
“ The least of those akin to me
Come forward and me disown ;
Forgetful of all natural ties,
Because no wealth by me is owned.

. . . . .
“ God knows that had I studied
In my hot, mad days of youth,
And lived aright, now in good sooth
House and soft couch should I own.
But woe is me ! from school I fled,
Just as still does a naughty boy ;
And now as these sad words I pen
My poor heart nigh to breaking comes.

. . . . .
“ My days have passed away,
As Job doth say.”

It is not possible for a man to speak more convincingly, and to express himself in a more bitter and touching fashion. Then he looks around, and finding himself alone, he says, —

THE GROTESQUES

“ Where are now the gallants full of grace
With whom I walked in days of youth,
Who sang so well and spoke so fair,
Who joked and laughed so merrily ?
Some now are dead and laid out stark —
Nothing is left of them by now.
Others have entered Paradise —
All that are left may good God save!

“ Others again by now have grown,
God be thanked, to lords and sires ;
But others, nude, on roads do beg,
And bread they know by sight alone.
And others yet, in cloistered cells,
Are monks Carthusian, Celestine,
Booted and hosed in wretched shape —
And these the varied fates of all!”

This trait, And bread they know by sight alone, could occur only to a man who has starved more than once. Villon, who was hungry to death three-quarters of his life long, always speaks of any kind of food with singular emotion and respect ; consequently all culinary details — and they are numerous — are lovingly mentioned and caressed. Gastronomic nomenclature abounds in every part, —

“ Sauces and broth, and great fat fish,
Flawns and tarts, poached eggs and fried,
Scrambled and served in many ways.

“ Savoury morsels and delicate,
Capons and pigeons and fatted hens,
Perch, and chickens, all white meat.

“ And every day a fatted goose,
Or else a capon rich with fat.”

An amusing thing is the grudge he bears to Thibault d'Aussigny, not because Thibault kept him in prison and wanted to hang him, but because he made him drink cold water and eat dry bread, —

“ Upon a small loaf he fed me
And water cold a summer long.
Free handed or close, mean was he to me:
God requite him as he treated me !

“ Thank God, and thank Jacques Thibault too,
Who made me drink cold water so ;
And in a dungeon deep, not one on high,
Made me a gag so often chew.”

On the other hand, the gratitude which he expresses for a certain Perrot Girard, a barber by profession, who gave him fat pork to eat for a whole week, is worth noting. He is as stout a drunkard as he is a stout eater. He knows that den, the Pine Cone, and other taverns of the day better than any other man. To mix water with wine appears to him an unpardonable crime, and he is far from dreading the gallows as much as he does a thin drink.

Next to the bottle and the stewpan, he thought much of death. He constantly refers to it, and his reflections, always deep and philosophical, are clothed in surprisingly energetic and accurate language. Hard though life has been for him, he clings to it, and cries like Mæcenas, "I care not, provided I live." Before La Fontaine, he found out that "Better is a live clown than a dead emperor."

This is the way he puts it, —

"Better live poor in coarse stuff clad,
Than lord to have been and in fine tomb rot."

He tries to find consolation in the thought that his fate is the common fate of all : —

"So I am not, this well I know,
An angel's son, and do not wear
A starry crown upon my brow.
My sire is dead; God rest his soul!
His corpse below a stone doth lie;
My mother too will die, I trow —
She knows it well, the poor old dame —
Nor shall her son on earth remain.

FRANÇOIS VILLON

“I know that rich and poor alike,
Scholars or fools, cleric or lay,
Nobles and clowns, the free, the mean,
The great, the small, the fair, the plain,
The dames that wear their ruffs so high,
Whatever their station in life may be,
Padding their figure, painting their face,
Shall Death catch up, and none escape.

“And whether Paris or Helen die,
Whoever dieth does so in pain
So great that breath it takes away ;
The gall it bursts upon his heart,
Then sweats he, God! a hideous sweat,
And from his ills no rest doth find.
For never a brother, or child or sister,
At such a time would stand his bail.

“Death makes him shudder and grow pale,
Draws in his nose, his veins doth stretch ;
Makes his neck swell, his flesh grow weak,
Stretches joints and nerves doth strain.
Thou feminine frame, that tender art,
Polished, and delicate, and most rare,
Must thou these dread ills all await ?
Ay, forsooth, or to heaven pass alive.”

Then follow three ballads, magnificent in their monotony, upon one and the same thought, with the same recurring refrain. In the first the poet asks what has become of the beautiful women of the days of yore, of Flora, the handsome Roman, of Thaïs, of

THE GROTESQUES

Echo, of Héloïse, of Blanche, of Bertha with the long feet, of Alix. What has become of them all ?

“ But where are the snows of yester-year ? ”

Such is the refrain of the first ballad.

In the second he takes up the men. Where are now, he asks, Pope Calixtus, Alphonso, King of Arragon, Arthur, King of Brittany, Lancelot and Charles VII, and Duguesclin, the stout Breton ?

“ But where is the brave Charlemagne ? ” is the sad answer he makes to his own question.

In the third ballad, taking up the same thought, but in a broader way and as if to be done with everybody, he inquires what has become of the brave knights, the heralds, the trumpeters, the pursuivants. The refrain now is, —

“ Carried away by the wind are they.”

After this long enumeration, he comes to the conclusion that he may as well die, poor devil that he is : —

“ Who, owning neither dish nor plate,
Never had even a parsley sprig :
Since popes, and kings, and sons of kings,
And those conceived in royal wombs,
Now cold and dead are laid in earth.”

---

Nevertheless, the thought of death worries him, and later on he returns to the subject and writes the fine meditation which I shall now transcribe. The scene is laid in the charnel house of the monastery of the Innocents. He has just ironically bequeathed his great spectacles to the inmates of the Blind Asylum so that they may separate in the cemetery the honest and the dishonest people : —

“ Here nor laugh nor play is seen,
Of what avail they once had wealth,
And once did lie in great state beds,
Or wine drank deep, their paunches filling,
Or their gay life of song and dance
Ready to lead at any time?
Their pleasures sweet all fail them now,
And sin alone of them remains.

“ When I behold those skulls all bare,
Heaped up within this charnel house,
Masters of requests were they all,
Or household comptrollers at the least ;
Or market-commissioners one and all :
The one or other I may them call,
For be they bishops or linkmen low,
Naught can I tell of their former lot.

“ And those who in this mortal life
One for another quick friendship felt ;
Of these some at one time ruled,
And feared and served by others were.

Behold them now content alike,
As in a heap they pell-mell lie.
Lordships no more do they now own :
No one is clerk or master there.

“Now they are dead, God rest their souls!
As for their bodies, they rotted are.
Whether were lords or noble dames,
Whether tenderly and softly fed
On cream, on porridge and on rice,
Their bones to dust have all returned,
And heedless are of play and strife —
May gentle Jesus them absolve !”

Along with the thought of death, there is another which haunts and torments Villon : What becomes of prostitutes when they grow old ? The prostitute troubles him considerably ; one can see that she has filled a large place in his life. He knows her thoroughly, understands her and describes her in every aspect, speaks of her sometimes with love and commiseration, sometimes with hatred and insult, but never with indifference. He cannot be cold in the presence of so important a subject. He gets excited, he becomes enthusiastic for or against her ; he covers her with mud or with tears, he excuses her, he explains her, says how she has got to be what she is ; and the story is the same as that which Alfred de

Musset makes Monna Belcolore begin and Julia finish :—

“ Honest they were, in very sooth,
Without reproach or blame in aught.
Though 't is true that at the first
Of these maids each and every one Took, ere dishonour to her came,
A clerk, a monk, or a layman each
To quench the flame of love that burned
Hotter than did Saint Anthon's fire.

“ So did, according to decree,
Their friends, as plain it doth appear;
They loved within a secret place,
For none but they did share that love.
Natheless, such love will pass away :
For she who did but one man love,
Parted from him and kept away,
Preferring much to love each one.”

Four hundred years before Alexander Dumas, he almost literally discovered the poor weak woman. I know nothing finer in any poet's work than the regrets of the beautiful Heaulmière, that is, of the beauty who was Heaulmière, to use his own expression. The scene is admirably described. Three or four old, blear-eyed, wrinkled women are seated on their heels in an evil-looking den, under the projecting mantel of a great chimney, up which ascends in spirals

THE GROTESQUES

a thin wisp of bluish smoke issuing from a heap of thatch, — for wood is a thing unknown in such a house, where the window-panes are made of cobwebs. Heaulmière, who was lovely and lustful in the days of her youth, mourns and regrets what can no longer return ; the other old women, formerly prostitutes like herself, acquiesce in what she says with shaking head.

“ Methinks I hear the sad complaint
Of the fair one that vended helms,
Wishing she might be a girl again,
And in this manner plaining :
Ah ! wicked age, ah ! age so harsh,
Why hast thou me so soon struck down ?
What stays my hand ? Why strike I not ?
And with one blow destroy my life ?

“ From me you’ve taken th’ exalted sway
Which beauty had on me bestowed,
O’er clerk and trader and priest alway ;
For in those days was no man born
That all his goods would not have given me, However later repent he might — Provided I to him did give
What prudes ill-bred would him refuse.

“ Yet many a man did I refuse —
Not very wise therein was I —
For love of a youth of clever mind,
To whom myself I freely gave ;

---

And whomsoever I deceived,
By my soul's weal I loved him well !
Yet harshly did he with me deal,
And loved me only for my gold.

“ Yet could he not so treat me ill,
Or kick me sore, but I loved him still ;
And though he dragged me on my back,
If only bade me then him kiss,
I all my pains at once forgot.
The glutton, soiled with sin,
Embraced me then — No profit hence,
For naught is left but sin and shame.

“ He died — 't is thirty years and more,
And hoary headed, old, I yet survive.
Alas ! when good old days I now recall,
What once I was, what now I am ;
When I behold myself undressed and nude,
And see I am so greatly changed,
Poor and meagre, dried up, wizened,
I could cry out for very wrath.

“ Where have gone my shining brow,
My hair so fine, my eyebrows arched,
The broad 'tween eyes, the radiant glance,
With which the cleverest I did catch ?
My fine straight nose, nor large nor small,
My pretty ears so closely set,
My well mark'd chin, my clear sweet face,
And my beauteous crimson lips ?

THE GROTESQUES

“ My shapely shoulders fair,
My two long arms and handsome hands ;
My twin small breasts, and well-fleshed hips
High and shapely, and right fit
To play the game of love’s debate ?
My strong loins and the daintiness
Between broad, firm thighs set,
Within its pretty garden-close ?

“ Wrinkled the brow, and gray the hair ;
Fallen the brows and dulled the eyes
That flashed so many a glance and smile,
Catching so many a trader then.
Hooked nose, of beauty shorn,
Ears that hang and hairy are ;
Ghastly faced, pallid and wan,
With sunken chin and puffed lips.

“ Such the end of human beauty,
Arms grow short and hands contract,
Shoulders bowed and humped become.
As for breasts, they wither up,
And the hips are like the head.
As for dainty, fie upon it !
And the thighs, all withered up
And blotched all over like sausage skin.

“ So the good times we regret,
Poor old hags together sitting,
Crouching low, on our heels resting,
By the mean little hempen fire —
Soon it flames, and soon goes out !
And yet of yore we were delicate !
Such is the fate of many a one.”

This piece, one of the finest ever written by the poet, shows how varied are the colours on his palette. It is impossible to depict youth with more youthful and fresher tints. The whole of the first part is so carefully and accurately drawn that it would do honour to a more modern painter. There is nothing in it of Gothic stiffness; it is lovingly executed and full of charming details, the artlessness, the occasional crudity of which I beg the reader to excuse. It is a cut-purse who makes a prostitute talk; it would be a mistake to ask for too much chastity in such a subject treated by such an author. To cut these things out would have been wicked. Certain things objectionable in themselves cease to be so in a style which has to be laboriously studied out and which may in some respects be considered as a dead language. Nudities in old paintings are in no wise reprehensible, and awaken no evil thoughts; they are a part of art and nothing else; and I shall always consider as stupid vandalism the act of mistaken piety which caused to be broken the stained-glass window representing Saint Mary the Egyptian offering to the boatman, in payment for her passage, the use of her beautiful body.

THE GROTESQUES

The second part, which is antithetical to the first, is no less remarkable. The poet takes pleasure in deforming the face he has created ; he digs out the eyes, he plucks out the eyebrows, he scores the forehead, he changes the golden hair into silver hair, pulls the nose down to the mouth and pulls the chin up to the nose. The beautiful and blooming lips that were crimson as roses, are now only withered and wrinkled skin ; the long white arms which voluptuously unfolded to attract their prey are shortened and drawn up, as are the shoulders ; the fair, firm, polished thighs which he has described so complacently are now fleshless and marked with red stains. The charming young girl is now but a spectre, an old woman, a regular broomstick witch. He casts away all the perfections he has created and tramples on them with ghoulish delight. It seems as if he took this way of avenging himself on the little Macée of Orléans, who took his belt, as he says, and who is a very bad lot, on Catherine de Vaucelles, on Jeanneton, on Marion the Idol, and other creatures of the same kidney, to whom, it would appear, he had no great reason to be grateful.

What think you follows this terrible attack — advice to return to virtue or something of the sort ? Not at

She ’s naught but coin that is refused.”

They are loved but for an hour.

That many men they may attract.”

some street Aspasia; he was so, and in the "Great Testament" he has included a ballad which he dedicates to big Margot, the Helen whose Paris he was. It is impossible for me to transcribe this ballad, for the cant and the decency of the modern French tongue will have none of the liberties and the free and easy ways of its old Gallic sister. It is a great pity, for never was a bolder picture traced by a bolder hand. The touch is firm and marked, the drawing clean and warm; there is no exaggeration or wrong colouring; the word expresses the thing itself, it is a literal translation; hideous lasciviousness cannot be carried farther. It is nauseating. The attitude of big Margot, her gestures, her words, are thoroughly those of a prostitute. She utters two words: one is an oath, by the death of Christ; the other an expression of ignoble tenderness, fit to disgust you with women for a fortnight. This big, blowsy, paunchy prostitute, whose colour is brighter than rouge, that ribald wench filled full of meat and wine, drunk and half undressed, mad, howling, and shouting, mingling her filthy caresses with kisses that stink of wine, and dangerous hiccoughs, is painted in masterly fashion with three or four strokes of the brush. Have you seen any of the libertine etchings of Rembrandt, — Bathsheba, Susannah, or especially Potiphar, — a marvellous mingling of the fantastic and the real? They are admirable yet disgusting things. Their nudity is cruel; the forms are monstrously true, and though abominable, resemble so much the most delicate forms of the most charming women that they make you blush in spite of yourself. It is a peculiarity of the masters that they know how to conceal a secret beauty within the most hideous creations. Well, if you have ever seen one of those etchings, you can form a most accurate idea of the figure drawn by Villon. The background, though scarcely indicated and half in shadow, can easily be guessed: a ceiling crossed by smoky rafters, an oak table and a broken coffer, a serge bedstead of a filthy green, worn by long and frequent service — the whole of the very scanty furniture of the prostitute. Through the half-open door are seen coming the clerics and the laymen, the citizens and the soldiers whom lust drives into this abominable den. At the back, our poet with his sarcastic look, pitcher in hand, who hurries down to the cellar and offers bread and cheese to the new-comers, ready to thrash them in fine fashion if they refuse to pay their bill, and advising them to return if they are satisfied. In the foreground the divinity of the temple, rouged, dressed up, beribboned, and laden with sham jewellery, in the full dress of her profession : a Teniers in the very best style of the master ; which Mathurin, the great poet, did not disdain, which he restored, retouched, and framed in his magnificent alexandrines ; which reaches to Ronsard on the one hand and on the other to Corneille. What sanctifies this impure picture are the last two sombre, desperate verses, which are, as it were, the finishing touch to the picture : —

“ Filthy we are, and filth follows us,
We fly from honour, and it flies from us.”

The poor scholar Villon did not have much luck in love, if we are to believe him, and he may surely be believed, for men are braggarts in such matters. Nor is it very surprising. He had no money in his purse — supposing he had one ; he was anything but good-looking, thin and dried up like a man hanged in summer, of a complexion as dark as a blackberry or a broom used to sweep out an oven ; he had no more hair, beard or eyebrows than a peeled turnip, — that is his own expression. Although he was scarce twenty, he looked old ; for he was worn threadbare by all sorts of excesses and privations. All this did not make up a very pleasant youth, so his lamentations are comical. He calls himself a martyr to love ; he composes a second epitaph for himself, in which he pretends he has been slain by one of Cupid's darts. Jeanneton turns him out, Catherine de Vaucelles has him beaten as unmercifully as if he were linen washed at the riverside ; he is deceived, robbed in every fashion ; he is made to believe that bladders are lanterns ; he is a dupe, he who dupes everybody, — so true it is that love makes everybody foolish, as he says in one of his ballads, in which he endeavours, according to his custom, to console himself by recalling a greater than he, Solomon, to wit, who turned idolator for love, Samson, who lost his clear-sightedness, Orpheus, the gentle minstrel, Narcissus the handsome, and Sardina, the brave knight (you would never guess that he means Sardanapalus), David the wise prophet, and Herod, and so many more. "This is not nonsense," he adds with most charming and artless self-possession ; "blessed is he who has nothing to do with it."

---

Villon, as he appears to us in his work, is the most complete incarnation of the people of that time. He seems to have suggested to Rabelais the delightful character of Panurge. And is there not, indeed, a very great likeness between Panurge and Villon the scholar? — Panurge, with his nose like a razor handle, Panurge the poltroon, the guzzler, the boaster, the street-walker, with his twenty-six pockets full of pincers, hooks, and scissors wherewith to cut purses, and many another evil instrument; Panurge, about as gross as he could be, not a bad fellow in his own way, save that he is somewhat libidinous and constantly subject to the disease called lack of funds, in spite of his sixty-three ways of obtaining them; Panurge who is impious and superstitious, and who really fears naught save blows and danger; and Villon, with his gipsy complexion, his long, dry, clutching hands, his ragged coat frayed and fringed, and shabby as that of an apple gatherer in Perche; Villon in ecstasy before the rich soups of the Jacobins; Villon frequenting houses of ill-fame while passing as a suffering lover; Villon, invoking at every line God and the Blessed Virgin and all the saints in the calendar; and never letting pass a single opportunity of turning into ridicule priests and monks, whatever their gown and whatever their colour. Both thoroughly hated the citizens and the watch, — in other words, proprietors and the guardians of property. They are two sorts of eclectic philosophers, who seize upon their own wherever they find it. And then, both ever suffering from an empty purse; for if they have sixty-three ways of getting money, they have two hundred and ten of spending it; having constantly recourse to expedients, being constantly within a hair's-breadth of the gibbet and avoiding hanging only by dint of wit and genius. Complete as is Panurge, Villon nevertheless is still more complete; there is in him a melancholy strain lacking in the other. He feels his wretchedness; something human still abides within his breast,—he loves his mother. Panurge seems to have fallen from heaven and to proceed from nothing at all. The thought that he has a father and a mother never occurs to us; he is probably the fruit of the loves of a ham and a bottle, or he grew up between the paving-stones like a mushroom at the door of some lupanar. His sarcasm is pitiless, his laughter is never tempered by tears. Nor has he his prototype's loving respect for woman's beauty; his lust is filthier, and has something monkish about it; it is the lust of a satyr rather than that of a man; he sees nothing beyond physical enjoyment, the ideal love is unknown to him. He would not have found such a line as Villon's—

---

FRANÇOIS VILLON

“Two were we, with but one heart.”

THE GROTESQUES

Panurge, rejected, has the woman who has repelled him filthied by dogs ; Villon breathes this elegy : —

“ The days will come that shall wither up,
Turn yellow and dry your beauty's bloom.
I 'd laugh, if then young I could walk ;
But, alas ! not so, and folly 't would be :
Old shall I be ; you, wan and ugly then.
So now, drink deep, long as the brook doth run ;
Do not bring to all the grief,
Without increasing it, a poor wretch to aid.”

One would think that it was Béranger singing, —

“ Old age will come, oh, lovely mistress mine ! ”

The point of likeness between Villon and Deburau, that other admirable poet of the people, who does not like to hear the nightingale warble, is the singular contempt which he feels for pastoral nature. In his verses, so full of colour and in which there are charming picturesque details, you never get the least glimpse of a landscape. There is a ballad in which he explains at length this antipathy of his. It is a charming genre picture. A canon, fat as ecclesiastics like him are, and who does not give the lie to the proverb, is seated, or rather is lying, upon a soft eider-down in a well closed-in and well carpeted room. The fire burns

---

bright, well up into the chimney. By his side is lying his housekeeper, Mistress Sydoine, white, dulcet, soft-skinned, rosy-cheeked. Flagons and cups full of hippocras are placed on the table. The joyous couple cast away the clothes that inconvenience them, laugh, play, kiss, and fondle each other. The poet, thin, starving, shivering with cold, looks at them from outside through a mortise hole, and envying their happiness exclaims piteously, —

“ Then did I know that grief to assuage,
Naught is so sure as to live at ease.

“ Had Franc-Gontier and Helen his mate,
That pleasant life tasted and known,
Onions and garlic that make strong breath,
They ne'er would have touched, nor burned brown crust,
Their curds or their porridge,
And never for garlic cared — this I say in all good grace.
If under the rosebush they boast they lay,
Which is the best ? A bed and chairs.
Which think you ? Need one long muse ?
Naught is so sweet as to live at ease.”

Unquestionably Villon did not care much for the ideal; but putting him aside, there are enough of the Gothic writers who have given us descriptions of the country. On the other hand, he initiates us into the whole of the home life of the Middle Ages ; he is as interesting to the erudite as to the poet ; he makes us acquainted with numberless fashions and manners that are to be met with nowhere else ; he takes us shamelessly everywhere, into lupanars, taverns, tennis courts, restaurants, hovels, and dens of all kinds ; he describes the hostess and the sign ; he does not spare us the least detail. The company is a curious mixture. All are thieves, scoundrels, prostitutes, procuresses, fences, and other worthy professions. The men are René de Montigny, Colin de Cayeux, thieves, and bosom friends of the poet, who were strung up ; Michault Culdoue, Brother Beaude, and others, who deserved to share the same fate ; Fremin, the little cleric, who will certainly be hanged, for with such a professor as Villon he cannot end otherwise ; Master Jehan Cotard, the jolly drunkard who bumps up against the butchers' stalls. And among the women we have Mashecroue, Marion Peautarde, Marion the Idol, Blanche, Rose, Margot, mistresses of Villon ; little Macée of Orléans, who corrupted him ; Catherine de Vaucelles, who had him beaten, Ysabeau and Guillemette, Denise, and a score of others, for our poet had more than one acquaintance among this class of people. All of them swarm and stir, live, get drunk, make love, and rob passers-by, and are reproduced with the most marvellous power. Villon needs but a word, a touch, to draw a personage; he hits on the distinctive character with singular sagacity. He reconstructs completely a man by means of a single word, of an epithet. The attitudes of his figures are indicated in a clean, sharp way which recalls Albert Dürer. What think you of this group?—

“Look at these two or three seated on the hem of their skirts in chapel or church.”

or of this one? —

“Hoods well down upon their heads; thumbs within their girdles stuck . . . saying, Hey? What?”

Among all these abandoned women a single woman's figure appears pure and spotless,—it is his mother. The bequest he makes to her is most graceful and poetic; it is a ballad to the Virgin.

what hard, like primitive things; the tones are bright but not crude, although the gradations are lacking in several places. It is true Catholic poetry, the poetry of a sincere believer, such as a greater poet could not write now. Amid the whole company of ballads its sisters, which are either fantastic or libertine or vile, this one blooms pure and white, like a lily in the centre of a mudhole. It shows that Villon could have done other work than he has done had he been lucky enough to meet with an Alexander as did the pirate Diomedes. But such fortune never came to him, and fate was too strong for him; in spite of his good intentions, he had to tread to the end the road on which he had entered. He died, no one knows where, poor, no doubt, as he had lived, —

“Now my body I give and bequeath to our common mother, Earth. Not very far will the worms find it, for too hard a war has hunger waged. Pray God it may be delivered soon; from dust it came, to dust returns. All things, if they stray not far, gladly to their place return.”

THÉOPHILE DE VIAU

IT is of a truly great poet that we are going to speak this time. He died young, was persecuted his life long, and he was ignored after death. His unlucky fate was fulfilled indeed; he himself says that he was born under an unlucky star. He would be completely forgotten but for two ridiculous lines of Nicolas Boileau in his "Art of Poetry":

"To Malherbe, to Racine, they prefer Théophile,
And the spangles of Tasso to gold of Virgil;"

and but for a wretched conceit drawn from his tragedy of "Pyramus and Thisbe": —

"This the dagger which with the blood of its master Has foully stained itself. It blushes, the traitor!" — lines quoted in all treatises on rhetoric as an abnormal example of bad taste, but which do not prevent de Viau from being a poet in the widest sense of the term and from having written one of the lines most praised in Delille's work, — and many more, which luckier men than he have profited by; among others that very Nicolas Boileau who speaks of him in such disdainful fashion. It is true that he mentions de Viau along with Tasso, and that is an insult which one might well envy.

Before I had read even a single line of his, I already felt a tender interest in him on account of his name, Théophile, which is mine, as you are aware — or perhaps you are not aware. It was absurd, perhaps, but I confess that all the harm that was said of Théophile de Viau seemed to me to be addressed to myself, Théophile Gautier. I would willingly have thrashed that pedant Boileau for the harsh lines in which he insults my poor namesake, and cast to the flames the treatise on rhetoric which contains the impertinent quotation. Never have I felt more deeply criticisms addressed to me personally. Forgive this foolish piece of pride, but it did not appear to me possible that a man bearing my name should be such a wretched poet as it was maintained that de Viau had been. There is nothing striking about the name Théophile, and perhaps I am myself a proof that it may be borne and the bearer write very bad verse; but I have heard that obscure name spoken so softly by such gentle voices that I love it as my own, and love it in others, and would not change it for your name William, old Shakespeare, nor for your Noel, O handsome Gordon Byron.

It became necessary for the repose of my mind to confirm my entirely gratuitous supposition that Théophile de Viau was in fact as good a poet as I, Théophile Gautier. A rapid reading of his works was more than sufficient to convince me of this fact, and I believe that this article, with a few quotations taken here and there at haphazard, will make you share my opinion, however great admirers of Boileau you may be.

The question comes home to me and is almost a family affair, so I shall give you no rest until you have bent the knee before my idol. I tolerate very willingly any sort of a religion, but I am most fanatically intolerant as regards Théophile, and if you do not believe in him as I do, I cannot see how you are going to be saved. Now, was it not a splendid idea in Théophile's godmother to give him that name and not another one? It is quite certain that if she had bestowed upon him the appellation Christopher or Bartholomew I should not have troubled about him in the slightest, which would have been a great misfortune for him, to begin with, for you, and for me also.

On the titlepage of his works Théophile gives only his Christian name, I know not why. His family name was de Viau, and not Viaud as it is commonly written. A passage from his apology written by himself testifies to this, and Father Garasse, his sworn foe, plays on this name with his usual amenity, and by a change worthy of a scholar and a theologian of the sixteenth century he calls him veau (calf).

Théophile de Viau was born in 1620 at Boussière-Sainte-Radegonde, a small village in Agenois, on the left bank of the river Lot, some distance above Aiguillon and about a mile and a half from Port Sainte-Marie, as we learn from several passages in his works and from a very eulogious poem, probably composed by Scudéry, printed at the beginning of the volume. The biographers and annotators who have said that he was born at Clérac were in error. It has been claimed that he was a tavern-keeper's son. That is an illustration of the devilish animosity entertained for him, for his family was well known, and nothing was easier than to prove the absurdity of such a statement; but Father Garasse did not stick at such trifles. Théophile's ancestor had been secretary to the Queen of Navarre; Henry IV had appointed his uncle governor of Touraine as a recompense for his loyal services, and his father, having practised at the bar at Bordeaux, had withdrawn to Boussière on account of the civil wars, fearing to be disturbed because he was a Protestant.

“ There stands a mansion small,
At the foot of a great hill.”

A tower built by the poet's ancestors draws attention to the manor from quite a distance, rising as it does above the humbler middle-class houses grouped around it. The landscape has a most romantic aspect. On the hill the soil is rather poor and rocky, but it produces an excellent claret, and one can live there very comfortably. Below, the meadows are green and rich, the woods well foliaged and shady. Boussière is a perfect little terrestrial paradise, if we are to believe literally the poetic descriptions of it which Théophile wrote in his dungeon. For many months and many years of his short, well filled life were spent in prison, and the window of a cell forms an admirable frame for a landscape. Everything appears much more charming when one is away from it, and pictures seen in the camera obscura of memory stand out with more vigour. In a passage which we reserve the right to cite he speaks of his hereditary patrimony and tells us that he had a steward called Belgarde. There is nothing about this which smacks of the tavern. A house large enough to have a steward is not usually turned into an inn. Besides, Théophile in his apology, written in Latin, — for he wrote at least as well in that tongue as in French, — speaks plainly on this point : —

“Eam domum quam tu cauponam vocas, aulici plures, atque ii qui melioris notæ dignitatis sunt, invisere et pro tenui nostro proventu aliquot dies frugaliter excepti, saltem immunes abire.”

“The house which you call a tavern, several courtiers of the highest nobility have not disdained to visit; and having been frugally treated, owing to our modest income, for a number of days, they at least went away without having to pay anything.”

“Rem novam, O Garasse, filius cauponis in celeberrima Galliarum regis aula annos ultra tredecim nutritus, tot nobilium familiaritate notus!”

“A tavern-keeper’s son for more than thirteen years at the court of a king of France, and publicly honoured by the intimacy of so many great personages, would be a novelty, O Garassus!”

In this retreat of Boussière Théophile’s father gave himself up wholly to the study of literature, and he probably gave his son his first lessons, for it would appear from the letter to Balzac that he had not received any regular education: "My teachers have been Scottish scholars only, and yours Jesuit doctors." This did not prevent his being a very learned and excellent poet. A passage of the "Curious Doctrine" tells us that he studied philosophy at Saumur.

He came to Paris in 1610. He was then twenty years old, but if we are to believe a portrait which illustrates the last edition of his works, he was anything but good-looking. The portrait represents him with an antique pallium over his shoulder and a laurel wreath around his head, producing a singular contrast with his curled-up moustaches and his beard cut in the most recent fashion. He has a bony, thin face, much seamed in every direction, and a very prominent brow; eyes not very large, but very brilliant; a somewhat large nose, though aquiline; the lower lip very full and projecting disdainfully, — the face of a man who has lived and suffered, who has thought and acted, who has lacked everything and gone to excess in everything; the face of a poet who has lived, in a word, which unfortunately is almost too rare among poets. The portrait is further confirmed by these words of Théophile's: "Nature and fortune have not given me many pleasant parts ;” but his natural qualities, his subtile and ready mind more than compensated for the absence of physical charms, and he was none the less welcome in the best of company and sought out by the young nobles who piqued themselves on having a taste for poetry. And indeed, it would be difficult to have a more fortunate poetic temperament than had Théophile. He is passionately fond, not of virtuous men and beautiful women only, but also of every beautiful thing. He loves a fine day, limpid streams, mountain prospects, far-stretching plains, rich forests, the shores of the sea, its storms and its calms ; he loves all that more particularly appeals to the senses : music, flowers, handsome clothes, hunting, fine horses, perfumes, good cheer. He is of an easy and sympathetic disposition, ready to grow hot about anything and everything ; a perfect, many-faceted piece of crystal which reflects in each of its tints a different picture enlivened and enriched with all the colours of Iris ; and I really do not understand why his name should be so perfectly forgotten, while that of Malherbe, the sworn sorter-out of diphthongs, is everywhere honourably cited. But as we have already said, Théophile was born under the most unlucky star, and prudent men have ever proved victorious over bold men. This explains how Malherbe, the grammarian, has eclipsed Théophile, the poet.

About this time Théophile formed a friendship with Balzac, the letter-writer, a friendship sufficiently close to give rise to absurd gossip, the sure resource of the evil-tempered who have nothing to say. They travelled together to Holland, but quarrelled at the end of their trip. The cause of their rupture is not known accurately. A contemporary writer, Father Goulu, the general of the reformed Cistercians, in his "Letters of Phylarchus," merely says that Balzac played a trick upon Théophile. The latter darkly hints at several rather shady acts on the part of Balzac. He reproaches him with being envious, proud, servile, crotchety, of uneven temper, and a plagiarist.

"Your face," he says, "and your naturally unpleasant disposition have retained something of your original poverty and the vice which usually accompanies it. I do not speak of your stealing from authors; the son-in-law of Dr. Baudius accuses you of a much worse theft. On this point I would rather be somewhat obscure than vindictive. If anything of the sort had turned up in my case you would have been the death of me, and you would never have felt the terror which my deliverance causes you. I expected while in captivity that you would have some recollection of the obligations you are under to me since our trip, but I find that you have tried to harm me as much as you ought to have served me, and that you hate me because you offended me. Had you been honest enough to excuse yourself, I was generous enough to forgive you. I am kind and obliging, you are cowardly and sly, and I think you will always follow your inclination and not mine. I do not repent having formerly drawn my sword to avenge a thrashing you received. It was not my fault that your affront was not avenged. It was then, perhaps, that you thought I was not a good poet because you saw I was a very good soldier. I do not bring this forward to acquire military glory or to reproach you in the least for your poltroonery, but to show you that you ought to have been silent as to my faults, since I had always concealed yours. I am neither a poet nor an orator, I have no knowledge of the art ; I speak simply, and merely know how to write decently. What brings me both friendship and envy is merely my easy habits and incorruptible faithfulness, and my open profession to love men who are neither rascals nor cowards; and here it is that you and I prove to be unsuited to each other. Having formerly promised me a friendship which I thoroughly deserved, your disposition must have changed very greatly to lead you to insult me in my person, and to strive with my enemies as to which of you would most outrage me in my affliction."

Balzac did not reply to this terrible letter, and that silence proves that he must have been greatly in the wrong since he allowed himself to be treated so savagely after having been the aggressor and brought up an old quarrel long since forgotten. Besides, Balzac's attack is vague and full of declamation, and his conduct is inexcusable, while it must not be forgotten that, at the moment, Théophile was imprisoned in the Conciergerie, charged with a crime punishable by death, in the same cell in which the regicide Ravaillac had been placed.

On his return from Holland he composed for the court festivals ballads, challenges, mottoes, and masquerades, which gained him much praise, such as "Apollo, Champion," "The Prince of Cyprus," "The Sailors," and other allegories in the taste of the day. These compositions are full of conceits after the Italian manner, and of excessive striving after ingenious ideas, but they are at least as well written and as clever as the best that Benserade and Bois-Robert have left. In "Apollo, Champion" occur these beautiful lines : —

THE GROTESQUES

“ I give out the heat that gives life to roses
And brings back to life the buried fruits ;
I bestow colour and duration on things,
And the splendour of fair lilies is due to me.
When I depart a mantle of darkness
Covers heaven and earth with a horror cold.
The loveliest orchards are melancholy sights,
For when my eyes are closed, the world is dead.”

Théophile indulged to excess the remarkable facility which he possessed, for it is natural to man to go to extremes in everything, even in his qualities. A number of his impromptus have been preserved, for he wrote impromptus and very charming ones. One day, when he was shown a small equestrian statue of Henry IV, he smiled and stroking the crupper of the horse, he recited the following quatrain : —

“ Small, pretty, gentle horse,
Easy to mount and dismount alike,
Though you are not a new Bucephalus,
You bear a greater than Alexander,” which is certainly one of the most successful impromptus known.

About this time he wrote his tragedy of “ Pasiphaë,” never performed, so far as I know, and not included in his collected works, but printed separately in 1631, a few years after his death. In the introduction to this play, which has now become extremely scarce, it is said, —

“Many persons are of opinion that this poem is in the style of the late Théophile. One of his most intimate friends assured me that it is, and stated that Théophile composed it when he was first at court. Trusting to this information, I have believed the fact to be as stated. The opinion which several excellent persons have expressed of this work has induced me to publish it as Théophile’s, in order that it may survive its author.”

This play, with “Pyramus and Thisbe,” forms the entire dramatic production of Théophile, who, to tell the truth, was not well fitted for play-writing, thanks to the fantastical and erratic turn of his mind. He did not deceive himself on this point, and explains the reason with remarkable sagacity : —

“Formerly, when I wrote for the stage, the rules I was constrained to observe gave me much trouble, and I was long a martyr to that unpleasant sort of work ; but at last, the gods be praised, I have given it up. Few have ventured on so long a voyage without being wrecked and losing their way. One needs, to succeed, to be miraculously wise and foolish at one and the same time, to unite memory and judgment, to invent freely, and to constantly draw verse in the same vein from a full spring of expression. I propose to write verse which shall not be constrained; to let my mind wander in lighter designs; to seek some place where nothing shall displease me; to meditate at leisure; to dream as I please; to pass whole hours in looking at myself in springs; to listen as in a dream to the babble of the brooks; to write in the woods; to break off, to be silent, to compose a quatrain without thinking of what I am doing."

These remarks are as poetic as they are accurate, — for the stage absolutely excludes fantasy. Extraordinary ideas stand out too boldly, and the footlights light up too vividly the frail creatures of imagination. The pages of a book are more complaisant, the impalpable phantom of the idea rises slowly before the reader, who beholds it only with the eyes of the mind. On the stage the idea becomes material and palpable in the person of the actor; the idea puts on powder and rouge, wears a wig, corks its eyebrows to make them blacker, stands on its heels near the prompter's box, listening and swelling its voice. It is so ridiculous that I am amazed that people do not burst out laughing at the very first scene of a tragedy. It takes long habit to bear with such a spectacle. So whatever differs in the least from a certain number of conventional situations and speeches strikes one as strange and abnormal; hence innovations on the stage are more difficult and more dangerous than anywhere else; a novel scene almost always insures the failure of a play, while there is no instance of a commonplace situation having prevented success. In every literary renovation the drama is always the last form touched upon. The ode leads the procession, giving its hand to the poem, its younger brother; then comes the novel. The drama drags itself unsteadily, non pedibus æquis, some distance behind the latter, which turns around occasionally to see if it is following, and which stops to wait for it if it is too far away. The ode is the commencement of everything; it is thought. Drama is the end of everything; it is action. The one is mind, the other matter. The ode is music without a libretto; the poem is music with a libretto; the novel is the libretto alone, and the drama is the materialisation of the libretto with the help of painted canvas, costumes, and foot-lights. It is only when a society grows old that it acquires a drama. In its decrepitude, when it cannot bear with even the small amount of ideas which the drama contains, it turns to the circus; after the play-actors come the gladiators, after the ranting of Melpomene the roar of wild beasts; for very extreme civilisation substitutes matter for spirit, and the thing for the idea. In the early days of the drama Theramenes came on mournfully to narrate the death of Hippolytus; to-day Hippolytus would die on the stage. Ere long a real wild-beast will really devour an unfortunate hero for the sake of greater realism and the greater satisfaction of the public.

Like all highly wrought natures, Théophile gave himself up to the pursuit of pleasure with an ardour which was no doubt excusable, but which caused him much sorrow later on. Not that I believe everything that has been said about him; I am of opinion that he was imprudent as much as anything else; that on the whole he was neither better nor worse, so far as morals go, than the young courtiers he frequented, and that he led the same sort of life led by all poets of the day who were received in the houses of great lords. As for his verse, at least that which he acknowledged and signed, it is certainly as chaste, if not more so, as the chastest verse of the chastest poet of that day. He loved good living, he says so himself; but that is not a sufficient reason for banishing a man from the realm, still less for burning him in effigy. He speaks on this matter with noble frankness:—

“I care more deeply for study and good living than for anything else. Books have sometimes tired me but they have never dazed me, and wine has often cheered but never intoxicated me. Indulgence in wine and women was nearly fatal to me on leaving school, for my somewhat impulsive nature had got beyond the rule of my teachers at a time when my morals still needed discipline. My companions were older than I, but did not enjoy so much freedom. The liberty which I enjoyed after the discipline of the schools was very dangerous to my soul. I was about to plunge into vice, which offered itself favourably enough to my young fancy, but the crosses of my lot turned my inclination elsewhere, and the ups and downs of my life did not give voluptuousness time to destroy me. Since then, little by little, my most libertine desires have died down as my blood grew cooler, and their violence diminishing every day with advancing age, I may hope henceforth for assured tranquillity. I am no longer so fond of banquets and dances, and indulge in the most secret voluptuousness with much restraint.” (“Fragment,” chap. ii.)

“As for the licentiousness of life which you desire to charge with the corruption of youth, I swear to you that, since I have been at court and have lived in Paris, I have known no youths that were not more corrupt than I, and that having discovered their vice, I did not long keep company with them. I am not bound to instruct them save by my example ; those who have charge of them are answerable for their debaucheries, and not I who am neither tutor nor school-master to any one.”

His liberty and freedom of speech gained him numerous and powerful enemies. Besides, he was a Calvinist, and did not speak with due respect of the Jesuits. At the court of a bigoted king like Louis XIII this fact was sufficient to involve disfavour, so an order was obtained from the king, obliging Théophile to leave the kingdom within the least possible time, — an order brought to him in the month of May, 1619, by the captain of the watch.

He went to London and sought to be presented to King James I, but it seems that the latter, prejudiced against the poet, would not allow it. To console himself Théophile wrote the following : —

“If James, the learned King, would not see me, it was because, delighted with my wit, he thought me a spirit and consequently invisible.”

The ode which he addressed to King Louis XIII is perfect in rhythm and taste. It begins thus : —

“He Who hurls the thunderbolt, Who rules the elements, Who moves with mighty quaking the great globe of the universe, God, Who placed the sceptre in your hand and may from you remove it to-morrow ; He Who lends you His light and, spite of your lilies, one day shall turn to dust your buried limbs ; that great God Who opened the abysses in the centre of the universe and keeps them ever gaping for the punishment of crime, has willed that innocent man should find refuge under the shadow of His mighty wing. He will not be angered if you stay the deluge of ills wherein you have cast me. Far away from the banks of the Seine and the pleasant air of the court, it seems to me as though the sun shines but dimly now. Upon the dreadful summit of a rock, which even bears dare not approach, I consult the Furies, which ever seek to impel my importunate thoughts to make me dash myself down. Amid barbarians where I find none to whom I can speak, my sad accents are lost in the air and on the echoing shore. Instead of the splendour of Paris, where the people with loud acclaim bless the King as he passes by, I hear the croaking of crows, and the thunder in the clouds speaks to me only of the dead."

It recalls, does it not ? Ovid exiled to Scythia. The country described by the poet seems to be Kamschatka or Scythia, rather than good old England, where stout is extra and beef more underdone than elsewhere ; even John Bull in 1619 could not possibly look as glum as he is described. But in those days there was but one country in the world for a Frenchman, and that was

France; and it was Paris only that was the real France, — Paris and the court. The expression which Théophile uses is more accurate than seems at first sight, when he speaks of “the gentle air of the court.” In truth, to the nobility the court was a peculiar country, a special climate created for it, an atmosphere out of which it could not live any more than fishes can live out of water. To see the King was more necessary to the courtier than to see the sun. His whole life was spent in watching for a glance from the sovereign; a remark from His Majesty delighted him. What does the King do? Where is the King? Does the King seem to be in a good or a bad temper? The time is drawing near when Louis XIV shall say with truth, “I am the State.” All the nobles so busily, so eagerly buzzing around the throne, the courtiers who die of despair because they have been snubbed, who go crazy with delight because they have been smiled upon, are already vaguely and unconsciously feeling this great truth. Richelieu, who is about to appear, will strike with his blood-imbrued hands the last blow at the great trunk of feudalism. By destroying the high aristocracy the Cardinal-minister prepares the way for the Revolution of 1793. After him there are no more great lords, great feudal barons fighting the King, and almost kings themselves on their own lands. "With his experienced hands he kills the lordships in their battlemented eyries." He completes the work begun by Louis XI, the sovereign who, next to him, the Cardinal-King (for Louis XIII was a mere figurehead), did most harm to monarchy while appearing to consolidate it.

There are no more great lords, there are courtiers only. The King stands alone, on a high pedestal, and, at the first glance, he appears great, but his very elevation and isolation make him the butt of all attacks; he is too high; there is a gulf between the people and himself. There is no class regal enough to be really royalist; the King's interests are no one else's interests, and no one will defend him against his people, not even the courtiers, who consider him merely as a distributor of pensions, and not as a man with whom they can make common cause.

The works of Théophile are full of regrets that he was so unfortunate as no longer to belong to the court, no longer to be admitted to the King's coucher, and, Heaven forgive me! he is more concerned about that than about the risk of being burned alive. Not that our poet is servile, — his freedom of speech nearly cost him dear, — but he felt the influence of his time, an influence which the strongest minds can with difficulty resist. We have insisted on this point because the need of being patronised on the one hand, and of paying court on the other, is one of the characteristics of writers and poets, even down to a period not very distant from our own, but which, so different is it, seems separated from it by a full two thousand years. Kings and princes were the first patrons, then great lords and literary ladies, then farmers-general and operatic singers. It became just as necessary to have one's poet as to have a monkey or a china mandarin; so true is it that the human mind is essentially progressive.

Théophile, having been recalled to court, overflowed with joy and delight. He rimed a small poem, perfectly innocent in our opinion, but which struck the Reverend Father Garassus as monstrous : —

“I am very well, brother, and my muse is troubled by naught. I have lost my profane temper, I am admitted to the King's coucher, and Phoebus every day in my home has double mantles of plush. My soul braves fate. Every day

THÉOPHILE DE VIAU

I feast. My room is about to be hung with tapestry. Every day to me is a Shrove-Tuesday, and I refuse to drink hippocras unless it is made with amber.”

Garassus discovers in that expression, “my soul braves fate,” and in one of the stanzas of the “Ode to King Louis XIII,” in which Théophile compares him to Jove, flagrant proofs of atheism ; and therefore pours out upon him a torrent of insults which would be very amusing, especially coming from a theologian, did not one remember that they nearly caused the death of the poet. The brother to whom he alludes in the poem quoted above was called Paul. He thanks him repeatedly for his kind friendship and the help which he sent him while in prison.

We have said that Théophile was a Huguenot, and that this was one of the reasons why he was persecuted. Not that he was a fierce and intolerant one, for he behaved with much sense and reserve on an occasion upon which a companion less reasonable than he got himself into serious trouble. He thus relates the adventure : —

“As we were proceeding towards the Quay Gate, we met at the corner of a lane the Holy Sacrament, which a priest was carrying to a sick man. The ceremony rather surprised us, for we were both Huguenots, Clitiphon and I, but his protestantism was of the most uncompromising kind, as he most unseasonably showed on this occasion ; for everybody kneeling in honour of the sacred mystery, I drew close up to the house, bareheaded, and bowing somewhat, as a mark of respect which I thought due to a settled custom and to the Prince's religion (God had not then done me the grace to receive me into His Church). Clitiphon proceeded insultingly to traverse the street in which every one was kneeling, without condescending to anything approaching a bow. A common man, as is often the case with such people, who through blind zeal are more easily moved to anger than pity, sprang at Clitiphon's head, knocked off his hat, and then took to shouting, ' O Calvinist ! ' "

So moderate a Huguenot was not far from becoming a Catholic, and as a matter of fact he did abjure his religion, perhaps through sincere conviction ; but it may be conjectured that he hoped thus to protect himself against the malignity of his enemies. He was mistaken, however, for he was persecuted as fiercely as ever. He had received instruction in the Roman faith at the lectures of Father Athanasius Arnoux and Father Seguerand. An atheist, such as he was accused of being, would not have cared enough about his salvation to change his religion. The hatred of the clergy sticks as fast as the stain of oil ; to remove it you have got to cut out the piece ; and the abuse of Father Garassus overflows into a big quarto volume.

“Here,” said Théophile, “is another flood of insult, in which he froths at the mouth more fiercely still. He calls me atheist and corrupter of youth, and charges me with indulging in the practice of all imaginable vices. As regards the accusation of atheism, I reply that I have not published, as he and Lucilio Vanino (a professor of theology who was burned alive) have done, the maxims of impious men, which have been equal to so many lessons in atheism (for they have both refuted them, and at the end of their discussion they leave a weak mind very ill instructed in its religion). But without claiming to be a scholar in theological matters, I am satisfied, with the apostle, to know Jesus Christ crucified, and when my reason fails in the presence of such a mystery, I have recourse to the authority of the Church, and believe fully whatever she believes. As to my soul’s health, I am so well satisfied with the grace of God that my mind declares itself incapable of not knowing its Creator. I adore and love Him with all the strength of my mind, and I feel deeply the obligations I am under to Him. As regards my conduct outwardly, in my rule of life I am privately and publicly a professing Roman Catholic Christian ; I go to mass and confession, and I communicate. Father Seguerand, Father Athanasius, Father Aubigny can testify to that. I fast on fast days, and last Lent, being pressed by an illness to which the physicians were about to abandon me because of my obstinacy in refusing to eat meat, I was constrained to have recourse to a dispensation lest I should be guilty of causing my own death. Father Rogueneau, my parish priest, and Dr. de Lorme, who signed the certificate, are irreproachable witnesses of the truth of this statement. I do not bring up these facts through hypocritical vanity, but because compelled, as a wretched man accused, to publish my devotion only to make my innocence plain.”

Undoubtedly many a devotee of the present time does not fulfil his religious duties as carefully as an atheist in those days.

“The Satirical Parnassus,” a collection of licentious verse which had just appeared under the name of Théophile and which was, as a matter of fact, merely a selection of such poems as imitators of Ronsard called gaieties, by different poets such as Colletet, de Frenide, Motin, Ogier, and others, served as a pretext for these various attacks, although Théophile had disavowed the work, and even caused the book to be seized and had suit brought against the printers, who, being confronted with him during his trial, declared they did not know him and had never had anything to do with him. “The Satirical Parnassus” bears the date of 1622. It is a curious literary monument in its way, this work. There is a very great difference between it and the filthy poems of Ferrand, Doret, Voisenon, and other frequenters of ladies' rooms, whether musketeers or abbés. It is as great a contrast as a head by Caravaggio, black with bitumen, by the side of a pastel by Latour, glowing with carmine, or a basso-relievo upon an antique vase by the side of one of Maurin's lithographs. Certainly such productions are unworthy of art, yet there is enough art left in them to cause one to regret seeing them burned, and to induce one to pull out a few leaves which have escaped the executioner's fire of straw; somewhat like that erotic museum at Naples, and beautiful statues, which no one has had the courage to break, but over which morality is obliged to draw a curtain.

THÉOPHILE DE VIAU

What a wonderful time that sixteenth century was! For Théophile and the society in which he moves belong to the sixteenth rather than to the seventeenth century, though they had lived somewhat in the latter. It was a fertile, rich, abundant age, full of life and activity. It is wonderful even in its turpitude. How small we are by the side of those great people! They know Greek and Hebrew; their cooks speak Latin fluently; theology, archaeology, astrology, occult sciences, they study deeply every one; they know all that exists, and even what does not exist. They take large bites of the fruits of the tree of knowledge, and they produce folio after folio; a quarto volume gives them less trouble than a duodecimo does to us. The painters and sculptors cover acres of canvas with masterpieces, and mould whole armies of statues. Men fight with swords which we can scarcely hold, in armour which would bring us to our knees. It is a time of theological quarrels, of riots, of duels, of rapes, of perilous adventures, of gross feasts in taverns; of sonnets in the Italian mode, of Greek madrigals upon a flea, of learned scholiae on obscure passages; of wildest debauches of great ladies or women of the middle class; an incredible variety, an unimaginable chaos. Blood and wine flow as freely the one as the other. Insults are exchanged in excellent Latin, men are burned alive, every girl is kissed, every dish is eaten. And such dishes — regular mountains of meat! Glasses are drained, and what glasses! It would take the contents of three of our bottles to fill them, and they are to our little goblets what the folio volumes of that day are to our octavos of to-day. What kind of ribs had those fellows around their hearts, that they could stand such work, such lovemaking, such debauch? What had their mothers made them of? Were the nights in which they were forged forty-eight hours long like that in which Hercules was conceived? Ah, wizened wretches that we are! Wretched drunkards, miserable debauchees, paltry lovers, mean writers, contemptible duellists, — we who roll under the table at our fourth bottle, who turn pale after three or four wakeful nights, who fall into a consumption because we have had three or four mistresses, who rest for a fortnight after writing a hundred lines, and who fight only when some one seduces our wife! Oh, how greatly have men degenerated since the days of Homerus the rhapsode!

Fathers Voisin, Garassus, Guérin, and Renard brought a joint charge against Théophile. Father Voisin, who had some influence with Cardinal de la Rochefoucauld, suborned witnesses, and, with the help of Father Caussin, a Jesuit, and confessor to the King, obtained an order of arrest against de Viau.

Théophile, seeing so many enemies leagued against him, took to flight, — slowly, however, to see how the matter would turn out. He was tried and condemned by the High Court, as guilty of divine lèse-majesté, to make honourable amends on the square of Notre Dame, and then to be burned alive on the Place de Grève. The sentence was pronounced on August 19, 1623; the execution was carried out in effigy. Théophile, wandering from one retreat to another, was arrested on the 27th of the following September and carried to the Conciergerie, where he was imprisoned in the Montgomery Tower and endured every imaginable suffering. Let Théophile himself relate them :—

“ After five or six months of error, uncertain in what part of the world I might still the terrors of my wandering wretchedness, an incredible piece of treachery caused me to be taken to prison from the place where I had sought asylum. My protector was transformed into an officer of the law. Heavens, how difficult it is to struggle against wealth ! A note from a monk, respected as much as letters patent, caused the bearer of the wandering muse to be watched in so many a place that at last two wicked provosts, both accomplished thieves and very devout, praying as if they were apostles, laid their hands upon my collar, and while saying their pater noster, robbed even my valet. Dazzled somewhat by the splendour of my appearance, they wondered whether I were not a counterfeiter. They questioned me as to the value of the doubloons they had taken from me, which did not bear the stamp of France. Then I trembled, fearing lest their ignorance should judge me according to their lights.

They could not fancy, without suspecting many a crime, that a mere maker of rimes should prove to be so fine a prey, and though the gold was fair and sound, both by light of day and by candle light, they believed, seeing that I was in trouble, no matter how much they took from me, that these coins were leaves of oak bearing the stamp of the witches' sabbath. Without points, lace, garters, or gloves, in the centre of ten halberdiers, I flattered the arrogant rascals that had been given to me for guards ; but all the same, laden with fetters, I was thrown into the hell of a deep, black hole in which one has naught but scanty exhalations of foul air, and the cold slime of a damp and sticky old wall. Within this common place of tears wherein I beheld myself, so wretched, the very assassins and thieves had more convenient cells. Every one said of me that I knew no faith nor law ; that there was no vice in which I had not indulged, and whatever I did write was worse than any murder ; that a holy man of much wit, a child of the blessed Ignatius, said both in his sermons and his books that I was dead through contumacy ; that I had run away only through fear of being executed as my effigy had been ; that I was naught but a suborner, and that I taught magic arts within taverns of ill-fame ; that the springs had been wound up of the black and powerful machine whose supple and vast body extends its arms as far as China ; that in France and in foreign lands they had the means of avenging themselves and of forging a thunderbolt the stroke of which would be fatal to me, even if it cost more powder than was lost at Vital. . . . As soon as I reached Paris, I understood by the confused rumour that all was ready to cook me alive, and I had reason to wonder whether these people were going to take me to the Grève or to prison. Here, then, as in a tomb, overborne by the peril in which I dream, alone and without a light, ever fearing execution, by the help of a little faint light which pierces somewhat this dark tower, where the executioners are ever watching — great King, the honour of the universe, I present you with the petition of this poor rimester. Did I practise the vilest trade that is practised on the streets, were I the son of cobbler or of codfish vender, it might be feared that an angry people, in order to punish the attempt of him who persecutes me, should do seditiously what its fury carries out in its blind emotion. Within this place, consecrated to misfortune, the sun, contrary to its nature, has less light and warmth than it has in paintings. The sky can scarce ever be seen ; nor light nor fire is here beheld. The air we breathe is deadly and everything is icy cold, so thoroughly is it the place where the living are dead. As Alcides overcame death when he compelled it to let Theseus go, you with less effort shall do a greater and easier thing. Sign the order to set me free. Then with three fingers only you will strike down two and twenty gates, and break the iron bars of three gratings which are stronger than all the gratings in hell.”

And he thus speaks in an apology addressed to the king : —

“A man who professes to be a monk and who has taken all the vows, took on himself to correct your clemency and, emboldened by my timidity, ventured to set the snares which now he is caught in. A provost of the constabulary, called Leblanc, his intimate confidant, was devoted to him. The latter took such good care to be complaisant to him in this commission that a place which can stand a royal siege proved too weak to protect me. This monk, whom this officer of justice obeyed so docilely, and who found the governor of your citadel so easy to handle, is, Sire, Father Voisin, a Jesuit, who, through unruly fancy and most scandalous caprice, is determined to avenge a wrong which was not done him, and has imagined subjects of offence in order to have a pretext to hate me. His mind has gone astray, and he is very ignorant of mine. He has instilled in weak souls a false opinion of my manners and my conscience, and, prostituting authority by his address and the extravagance of his passion, has published broadcast all those infamous accusations for which to-day he is in penitence. He entered every place of his acquaintances and kind to scatter there the evil smell which had made my reputation so odious. He suborned the zeal of a foolish Father, who vomited a whole volume to free his companion’s bile. It is the author of the ‘Curious Doctrine.’

“Thus did this man pour out his profanations, trusting to public ignorance. Another proclaimed in the pulpit with much shouting, ‘Read the Reverend Father Garassus! I tell you to read him. It is an excellent book.’ And as soon as I was brought to this town, he adorned one of his sermons with these pretty remarks: ‘Accursed be you, Théophile, and accursed be the spirit which dictated your thoughts! Accursed the hand which wrote them! Woe to the book-seller who printed them; woe to those who read them! Woe to those who have ever known you. And blessed be the chief justice and the attorney-general who have purged Paris of the pest that you are. It is you who have caused the plague to be in Paris. I shall repeat, with Reverend Father Garassus, that you are an ass, that you are a calf. A calf, do I say? But a calf’s flesh is good when boiled, a calf’s flesh is good when roasted, with a calf’s skin are books bound; but you, wicked man, are only fit to be burned, and burned you shall be to-morrow. You have turned the monks into ridicule, and the monks shall laugh at you.’”

This is indeed a fine torrent of eloquence; this is a fine sally on the part of Jean Guérin!

The whole quarto volume of Father Garassus, for it is a quarto volume, is written in this style. It is a strange book. He insults, at one and the same time, Théophile, Luther, and a certain Lucilio Vanino. He accuses them of gluttony and atheism; he calls Théophile a poetaster, a rascal, a filthy parasite, a drunkard; he calls Luther a big German bull, a big gormandiser, who can only eat and drink, whose soul is fleshly, and who could not fast a day but that he would think himself dead ; he calls Lucilio Vanino a corrupter of youth, a naturalist, and an atheist. He shows wherein atheists are like griffins, which are a compound of mouth and belly, and like crocodiles ; though there is this difference, that the griffins eat once in forty days, which has never happened to atheists, who eat forty times a day. How they go into taverns of ill-fame to dine, at two pistoles a head, with young nobles whose material shadows they are ; how they may well be called caterpillars at the dinner hour, because they have innumerable feet like caterpillars to reach a table, and they live more on dishes than caterpillars do on trees ; how they are only fit to produce verses before and worms after their death, and how the worst of the latter are not those which swarm in their putrid bodies ; how if they did not rime sonnets and nonsense for the prostitutes kept by the sons of good families, they would run great risk of starving wretchedly and would be reduced to swallowing their slime like caged snails ; and finally how they are, at one and the same time, asses, wolves, dogs, and black beetles : asses, because of their stupidity and the bacchanalian songs which it is their habit to shout at the Pine Cone and at the tavern of the

THE GROTESQUES

Wooded Isle ; wolves, because they are ferocious, and like wolves have a stiff backbone which refuses to bend when a procession passes by ; dogs, because they are shameless and they wear their plumes as dogs carry their tails, sticking up ; black beetles, because they are always grubbing and rubbing their noses in filth and carry as these do a ball of filth which is their half-digested meat, with which they fill their damned guts on fast days and during Lent.

There are politeness and nice expressions for you ; and yet it is quite in the usual tone of controversy between scholars in the sixteenth century. The answers of Théophile form an exceedingly rare exception, inasmuch as they are masterpieces of decency and good language. His moderation is all the more striking in comparison with that mad fury, and every decent person is bound to take his side. All the same, Parliament took two whole years to review his case. These two years were spent by him in almost incredible suffering. His cell was dark and damp. It was the cell which had been thought worthy, a few years before, to hold Ravaillac the regicide. Nothing more need be said.

The sentence against him was commuted to simple banishment. He withdrew to Chantilly, the seat of the Duke of Montmorency, who had always been his protector and who was scarce more fortunate than his protégé, for, after having won several battles, he died on the scaffold. It was in this retreat that Théophile composed in honour of the duchess the poem entitled "Sylvia's Grove." The grove still bears that name.

Théophile did not long enjoy his freedom. Privations, troubles, excesses both of work and of debauch, suffering of all kinds, had seriously impaired his constitution, which was naturally robust. He fell ill and never recovered. A few minutes before his death he earnestly begged his friend Mayret to give him a red herring. Mayret refused, fearing that it would hurt de Viau, and all his life he reproached himself with not having indulged that last fancy of a man whom he had deeply loved. This was in the year 1626, and Théophile was only thirty-six years old. When all he accomplished in his busy and unfortunate life is taken into account, it is difficult to imagine how high he might not have risen, had Heaven been kind to him, and had he lived as long as his robust body, inured to fatigue, seemed to make it likely.

So far we have spoken only of his physical life.

THE GROTESQUES

We shall now examine his mental life, his poetic system, his prosody, and the nature of his defects and qualities. We shall consider him in his relation to the other poets of the times, and chiefly to Malherbe; for, as we have already said, Théophile is really a great poet, and his influence, although unseen and unexplained, is yet very marked upon contemporary literature. It is quite a surprise to meet in Théophile's writings with ideas which struck the public some ten or twelve years ago as being audaciously novel; for it is he—we are bound to say it—who initiated the Romanticist movement.

We have said that Théophile de Viau was a great poet; the fragments that I have cited above prove that he was a no less great prose writer; that his feet were as good as his wings, and that he walked as well as he flew. That is the poet's privilege; when he exchanges the language of the gods for that of men, he speaks the one as perfectly as the other. Prose writers, on the contrary, cannot write half a dozen verses. Birds can light on the ground and walk on it like quadrupeds, but quadrupeds however rapid their speed, cannot spring into the air and fly like birds. This is a fact which could easily be proved, and which might give rise to very interesting investigations, but it would lead us too far, and we shall perhaps take it up some other day. The fact remains that the prose of Théophile is as fine as that of any other writer. It is full of the splendid Castilian forms of expression, of the well-bred terms which give to the prose of that day such a rich and imposing appearance. The style is thoroughly artistic, and is unquestionably that of the best society. The broad effects produced by the sentences recall the great stiff folds of rich old stuffs embroidered all over with gold and silver. You never see a word trip on itself and fall flat in the very middle of a sentence, as a countess born in low estate trips upon her train and falls. In all his prose writings there is a certain familiarity full of good taste. The tone is that of a nobleman accustomed to his station; it has an indefinable perfume of high aristocracy, the charm of which is inexpressible. The reader feels that he can proceed in perfect safety; he will meet with no expression which is not well received at court and approved of the King. The secret of that style will never be discovered until men again take to wearing swords, and feathers in their hats; not the small-sword of whale-bone in a velvet sheath worn by the marquesses of Crébillon, nor the three-cornered hat edged with white feathers, but the great steel rapier and pointed felt hat of the blades, with its red plume. Buffon's lace cuffs show to poor advantage by the side of the slashed and lined sleeves of the fashionable men of that day. What can be more charmingly written, wittier and more delightful in every respect than the page we transcribe below, and which is the more interesting because it is in a certain sense an express profession of literary faith on the part of our poet!

Our own writers are usually elegant somewhat in this fashion, thanks to the ignorance of the public and the vanity of bookmakers: —

“The golden and azure dawn, embroidered with pearls and rubies, now showed at the gates of the Orient. The stars, dazzled by the brighter light, paled their whiteness, and little by little turned into the colour of the sky. The animals, which had been hunting, retraced their steps into the forest, and men were going back to their work. Silence was replaced by noise, and darkness by light,” etc.

Composition must be close, the meaning must be naturally and easily seen, the language accurate and significant. Affected ornaments are merely the product of loose writing and artifice, and always involve effort and unintelligibility. The ornaments which are no longer to our taste, and which are called imitations of the authors of antiquity, should be called thefts.

“Men ought to write in modern fashion. Demosthenes and Virgil did not write in our day, and we cannot write as they did in theirs. Their books, when they composed them, were new ; we are composing old works every day. It is profane and ridiculous in us to call upon the Muses after the fashion of these pagans. Ronsard’s vigour of mind and pure imagination are comparable in innumerable ways to the splendour of the old Greeks and Latins, and he came nearer to them than when he set to translate them, or when he took that Cytherean ‘Gatarus, by whom the Tymbrean tripod —’

“He apparently strives after incomprehensibility in order to appear learned, and seeks the sham reputation of being a new and bold writer. He is unintelligible to Frenchmen when he uses these foreign terms. Such extravagance simply disgusts scholars and stupefies the weak. Some call this fashion of using obscure and inappropriate epithets barbarism and lack of culture, others call it conceit and pedantry. For myself, I believe it is due to the respect and admiration Ronsard entertained for the ancient writers, thinking whatever he found in them excellent, and seeking glory by constant imitation of them. I am aware that a prelate who is a good man may be imitated by every one. One has to be chaste and charitable as he is, and learned, if that be possible ; but a courtier, in order to imitate his virtues, would in vain live or dress in that fashion.

THE GROTESQUES

One must write a good description, as Homer did, but not by making use of his expressions and his epithets ; we must write as he wrote, but not what he wrote. It is a praiseworthy devotion, worthy of a lofty soul, to invoke the sovereign powers at the beginning of a work, but Christians have nothing to do with Apollo and the Muses, and our modern verse, which is no longer sung to the accompaniment of the lyre, should not, therefore, be called lyric, any more than other verses of ours should be termed heroic, since we no longer live in heroic times. All this nonsense can neither please nor profit an intelligent person. It is true that distaste for these superfluities has given rise to another fault ; for weaker minds, which the attraction of booty induced to take up the profession of poet, through the care they took to avoid worn-out commonplaces already repeated for so many centuries, found themselves on barren ground, and not being naturally strong or skilful enough to make use of the objects which offered themselves to their imagination, they came to the conclusion that there was naught in poetry but material for prose, and became persuaded that figures do not belong to poetry, and that a metaphor is an extravagance."

These lines were written at the beginning of the seventeenth century, but in truth one might think they had been drawn from the preface of some Romantic work which appeared but yesterday. It proves that the antagonism between the two principles has existed

at all times, and that the periwig is not a modern invention, but exists since the creation of the world. In the seventeenth, as in the sixteenth century, we shall still come upon routine, which insists upon governing expression with its heavy ruler, and which evolves recipes to enable a poet to be at will Pindaric, elegiac, or heroic. It is the great quarrel between the ancients and the moderns, which began with Ronsard and is not yet ended. For Ronsard — whose fame had been so long and so much contemned and despised, and has been restored by the Romanticists through a sort of contradiction, which, however, is not quite illogical — is unquestionably the man who introduced Classicism into France. He broke violently with the good old Gallic spirit of which Clement Marot was the last representative. It is poor Ronsard, the nobleman of Vendôme, and none else, who let in the choir of the Muses of antiquity, and who presented them at court dressed in a costume half Greek, half Gallic. He exchanged the chant royal, the rondeau, and all the national forms of our poetry for the strophe and the anti-strophe, the epode, and the Greek and Latin forms. He has foreign, barbarous expressions after the fashion of those you have just read, and very many more besides. He has invented double-faced words, deformed imitations of Janus, which grammar cannot behold without terror, and of which Du Bartas made such an astounding abuse. He has syncopated verbs; he has thinned out into diminutives, after the antique mode, numbers of words which appear greatly surprised at the tail of prettinesses which have been most improperly stuck on behind them. All this is true, no doubt; but, on the other hand, he has imparted to our poetic verse a full and sonorous harmony, a virile, robust accent unknown before him. He has drawn the muscles and made the bones to be felt under the soft, pasty forms of the old idiom. He made the French Muse, already pretty old to be indulging in prettinesses and artless speeches in the puerile style of the trouvères and the minstrels, speak a tongue more suitable to her. Through the thick layer of pedantry, of obsolescence, shines out a touch of incomparable freshness and brightness. Behind his mythological figures there are landscape backgrounds brought out with inimitable feeling for nature. His muse, though draped after the Greek fashion, breathes a melancholy wholly modern in character. His sonnets have a tender grace which recalls the elegies of Tibullus and of Propertius; but he is thoroughly Gallic at bottom, in spite of the rags which he goes picking up here and there among his authors, and his style, in spite of its efflorescence of Greek and Latin, clings sturdily to the robust trunk of the old idiom and draws all its sap from it. The vesture is different, but the body is the same. His "Discourses in Verse" contain many a passage which might have been written by the bronze pen of the great Pierre Corneille. A pedant he may be, but he is unquestionably a poet, and all poets in France since the sixteenth century descend in a direct line from him. Mathurin Régnier openly confessed himself his pupil, and what a poet must be that man whom Régnier, admirable himself, proclaims to be admirable. Corneille uses no other style than Ronsard's when he writes a political tirade, and considers the mould used by Ronsard solid enough to pour into it his adamantine verse. Molière makes use of his overlaps, of his shifting cæsura, and does not think, though so long a time has elapsed, that the methods of Ronsard have become obsolete. La Fontaine is connected with him through the numerous archaic and idiomatic expressions which impart so much savour and grace to his style, which is so French that it becomes Gallic. Leaving aside

THE GROTESQUES

THE GROTESQUES

Ronsard's own contemporaries such as Remi Belleau, Antoine Baïf, Amadys Jamin, and others, very worthy poets, such as Théophile, Saint-Amant, etc., have felt his mighty influence, and have reflected some of the beams of that magnificent sun of poesy which he caused to shine upon France.

Some time after he appeared there arose another school, an envious, unproductive school, a sorter out of words and a weigher of syllables, a school of grammarians opposed to a school of poets, as is always the case, which set about revising, stanza by stanza and comma by comma, all the verses of the Pleiad and to treat its stars most insolently. Its schoolmaster was that dry, tough, fibrous Malherbe, about whom Nicolas Despréaux Boileau, a writer of the same kidney, wrote the following superlatively triumphant lines which contain nearly as many mistakes as they do syllables:—

“At last Malherbe came, and, the first in France, imparted to verse a cadence just; of a word rightly placed the power did show, and trained the Muse to laws of duty. By this wise writer the tongue improved, no longer shocked the ear refined; with grace the stanzas learned to flow, and line into line no longer ran.”

I am of opinion, notwithstanding the belief of the author of the "Ode on the Taking of Namur," that words were put in their right places even before the advent of Master François de Malherbe. As to the "cadence just," I have not ascertained that up to that time verse lacked rhythm; as for the stanzas which learned to flow gracefully, I consider for my part that the stanzas of Ronsard, the greatest lyric inventor that ever was, are turned with as much grace as those of that far from Pindaric ode, "Will you credit it, ye future generations?" and I do not think, unworthy Romanticist that I am, that the suppression of the overlap has been a very great blessing, but rather the opposite.

Malherbe, the least poetic mind that ever existed, is in verse a very close copy of what Balzac was in prose. He is full of the same narrow, fruitless purism, of the same syntactical minutiae, and lacks to an equal degree both ideas and feeling. In Balzac's letters, as in Malherbe's verse, all is small, symmetrical, stunted; the sobriety of style is carried to the extent of meanness; there is no abundant breadth and fulness. The dress in which their ideas are clothed is too scant for them, and it has to be pulled down with both hands to make it reach the feet. The striving after the suitable and polite expression often degenerates into preciosity; the unskilful richness of the rime brings around at the end of each line the same assonance. They are marvels second to none else, the finest in the world, expressions admirable unquestionably and of the finest art, worthy in every respect of the poets of the "Selected Pieces," but their repetition at length becomes wearisome. It is of no use to look for metaphors, figures, feeling, — for whatever, in a word, is poesy; for poesy is a closed book to them; they have not the least conception of what it is, and profess for it a contempt which strikes one as very peculiar. Malherbe could not rest until he had robbed the tongue upon which he worked of all its colouring matter, by dint of filtering it through syntax. He acted as a chemist might who should leave within his retort naught but the colourless and tasteless residue of a rich wine. Others followed him and again passed through a thicker filter the clarified liquor which he had obtained, so that, so far as poetry is concerned, the result was a language as transparent as crystal, and as cold and hard also, no doubt wonderfully well fitted for writers of treatises on mathematics. Jean-

Baptiste Rousseau, our first lyric poet, as he is called, descends directly from Malherbe, and a pretty poor product he is. So when real poets did come, they were obliged to go back abruptly and at one step to the sixteenth century in order to find there a poetic tongue, until they could manage to create one for themselves.

For the rest, there is nothing on earth comparable to the insolence and the damned coolness of Malherbe. His answer to Yvrande, Racan, Collomby, and a few others of his friends, about Ronsard, half of whose poems he had blotted out and the remaining portion of which he struck out, is well known. His coarse and brutal reply to Desportes, to whom he said that his soup was better than his Psalms, and that he need not take the trouble to go and fetch the latter; the way in which he treated Pindar, and his preference for Statius and Seneca, suffice to enable one to judge of the extent of his good breeding and of the soundness of his judgment. At the time that Théophile was being tried, he said that for his part he believed him innocent, but that if people were to be burned for writing poor verse, Théophile thoroughly deserved to go to the stake; and turning to Racan, he added,

THE GROTESQUES

“But you run no risk of being accused of being his accomplice.”

Théophile, who speaks of Malherbe in some parts of his work, judged him very cleverly and wittily; and without estimating him above his worth he did him the kind of justice which in a way he deserves. Here is what he says of him:—

“I never was conceited enough to take from Malherbe’s verse the French which that verse taught us.”

And elsewhere:—

“Let who will imitate others’ marvellous work; Malherbe did very well, but he worked for himself. Numberless small thieves are skinning him alive; as for me, I envy not such thefts. I quite approve of every one writing in his own fashion. I approve of his reputation, but not of his teaching. Those begging writers who lack inspiration borrow constantly his rimes or his style, and join the gold and silk of so many fine things which we admire in him to ugly rags; thus appearing in our day as ill-conditioned as of yore appeared Horace’s crow. They work for a whole month seeking how they can rime *fil*s and Memphis, Lebanon and turban, and the gloomy rivers often find it difficult their bounds to know. Their straining makes them unintelligible; never once do they clearly see. I know some who write verse in modern fashion only, and who, at high noon, with lighted lantern seek the sun ; who so scrape their French that it is torn to bits, and who blame whatever their taste considers easy. They take a month in learning speech by touch ; when the accent is harsh or the rime weak, they strive to make us believe that all they do is fine, and that their fame will last beyond the tomb, for no other reason save that they have spent their life in turning out a tiny piece of work ; that their verse will last, treasured by the world, because they have grown old in making it, just as a spider, a clean web spinning, uses up its life for a transient result."

Boileau may have had this tirade in mind when he said, —

"In patchwork verse they tear Malherbe to bits."

The lines of Théophile are as sound as they are witty ; he turns them in clean, easy fashion, and with irreproachable taste. It is impossible to criticise more wittily Malherbe's defects, while appearing to attack his imitators only. Further, he shows us that the quarrel between writers who work with difficulty and facile writers, between grammarians and poets, existed even then. Malherbe had already said that after writing a discourse of three pages and a poem a hundred lines long, a man should rest for ten years. Théophile has admirably hit off the disdainful critics who "blame whatever their taste considers easy," and who devote their life to weaving a work which has no greater strength than a cobweb, and which is none the better for having taken so much time in the composition. Worthy Régnier took upon himself to pen a companion picture, in which it is difficult to know which to praise most, the boldness of the sketch or the warmth of the colouring. It is in his satire addressed to the poet Rapin, and nothing is wanting to that apostrophe of old Régnier, not even the word "art," so much abused now-a-days, and which is turned to account to hinder those who are real artists.

Théophile, in the quotation given above, criticises with admirable common sense all the wretched scivengers of fantastic temper who, themselves as impotent as hornets, think it ill that bees should love flowers and make honey; for, properly speaking, figures and metaphors are the flowers of the garden of poesy, and he who wants them to be cut away knows nothing of poesy; the Greek bee has dropped no honey on his lips. He is fit only to write in poetic prose, that is, in the worst language known to earth next to prosaic verse, an inversion which unfortunately is popular in the days of literary trials in which we live.

---

Everything which Théophile calls for, we called for at the time of the poetic revolt which took place under the Restoration, and no one can deny that much-abused Théophile is right, both as regards the matter and the form, in what he says. Hence all the anathemas which have been hurled at him and the bitter animosity which certain people entertain towards him. Every one knows how vicious and terrible is literary hatred; our own days have shown to what an extent it can be carried; it is even bitterer, if that be possible, than political hatred, for the latter usually touches self-interest only, while the other hurts wounded or suffering self-love, which is much worse.

Théophile proscribed the use of mythology, and wished the decrepit divinities of ancient Olympus to be left in their worn-out paper heaven. He was of opinion that rosy-fingered dawn had ceased to be very entertaining, and was getting terribly blotched in the face; that it was high time to drop Phœbus, with his blond wig and his hurdy-gurdy, and that, after all, the bass viol of pale-faced Saint Cecilia was at least as good as the trump of blowsy Clio. He appeared to care very little for the symbolic virginity of the nine sacred maids, — an unpardonable crime, — and he did not have much more use for poor little naked Cupid. He pitilessly pulls out the feathers of his wings, takes from him his quiver, his torch, his leaden and golden arrows, and all his old-time paraphernalia. If Alfred de Musset asked of the poet in the magnificent opening lines of “Rolla,” —

“Do you regret the days when heaven and earth lived and shone in a nation of gods? When Venus Astarte, uprisen from the wave, shook off, a virgin yet, a mother’s tears, and fertilised the world as she twisted her hair?”

He would have replied proudly and without wasting a single sigh upon all those lovely chimeras forever vanished : —

“Of yore the mortals spoke with the gods; these incessantly rained down from heaven. Sometimes animals themselves prophesied; the oaks of Dodona were oracles, too. These tales trouble bold spirits, which now feel differently from men of yore. On this point some day I hope to speak.”

I know of no modern writer who exhibits such marked disdain for ancient mythology, who kicks so insolently those poor devils of gods who cannot help themselves. It would not have been so bad, either, if he had been satisfied with being impious and atheistic with respect to bygone divinities; so much might perhaps have been forgiven him; but he did not stop there, the confounded innovator that he was.

You all know how powerful Phyllis was in those days; how she was petted, lauded, sung in madrigals, what innumerable sighs were uttered on her account; how many fainting fits, gallantly indiscreet dreams, intoxications, and despairs, quatrains and stanzas, short lines and long lines, blank verse and other verse, sonnets, complaints, and songs she was the cause of. All the echoes and parrots of that day knew her name by heart. Her eyes gave birth to six thousand sonnets, each single hair of her head produced one, her lips inspired more than there are saints in the calendar; I will not attempt to enumerate those which were rimed about her bosom, for the whole of the Arabic and Roman numerals would be insufficient.

Well, that Phyllis, so high bred, so precious, ever young, ever fair, who appears to have been for two or three centuries the only woman in France, that Phyllis, whom he had courted himself as others had done, — he one day throws in her face like a challenge these brutal lines: —

“As oft as love recalls to my heart the innumerable charms of the eyes of my fair, and what honour it is to love so well, I esteem myself greater and happier than a god. Amarantha, Phyllis, Calista, Pasiphaë, — I hate the softness of your names; the effort to attribute to you so many charms proves that in fact your eyes had none. The divine belief of my gentle love is that Mary’s name is the fairest on earth. Whatever the care that broods over me, it is cured by the utterance of that fair name. My heart is moved, my soul is touched by the secret charms of hidden virtue. I constantly call on her, I cannot refrain, no other remembrance within my mind doth rest; — naught else I know, none else I see. Would to God she knew the pain I feel!”

Mary — oh, fie! Mary, the name of the Mother of God, the name of a queen, the name of a Christian! This is unparalleled abomination. What depravation of taste to prefer such a name to those beautiful Greek and Latin names, so mellifluous, so euphemistic! From that time Théophile was lost for good.

Add to this that he was going to write, had not death prevented him, a poem, not on the death of Adonis or some similar subject, as it would have been decent of him to do, but a national poem drawn from our old chronicles, —

THÉOPHILE DE VIAU

“And these old forgotten portraits, retraced in my poem, will spring from the old chronicles, and, restored by my verse, will rise greater in the esteem of the world.”

You see that his plan of insurrection was complete, and that in every respect it was identical with the revolution which has just taken place, even to the return to the Middle Ages.

Besides these points of resemblance there is also the seeking after colour and the study in nature itself of landscape and picturesque effects. He paints a picture with a figure and a landscape after the manner of Giorgione, of a golden, transparent, fresh colour, the drawing of which, though somewhat mannered in the contours, is nevertheless neither inaccurate nor lacking in charm. He lays the scene in a forest, or rather, in a park, probably that of Chantilly, where he is walking with his mistress; and to find in French poetry a poem more thoroughly full of love, of the cooing of doves, of breaths and of sighs, more divinely scented with the perfume of wild flowers, one is forced to come down to the earlier “Meditations” of Lamartine,—that is to say, to our greatest poet. His Elvire is the mate of Théophile’s Corinne, and he alone could impart so much coolness to the foliage and so much melody to the ripple of the water, to the sigh of the breeze. There is in Théophile's poem a breath of that love which inspired Solomon with his admirable "Song of Songs." Only Théophile's love is more sensual, less Christian and mystical than that of Lamartine, as is to be expected. One would seek in vain in the ethical, dry poetry of Malherbe anything approaching the vivacity, nobility, harmony, and correctness of Théophile's verse. Malherbe's lines to the Viscountess d'Auchy and his sonnets on Fontainebleau are inconceivably dry and barren, and yet it was into these, if ever, that he should have put passion and colour. These two qualities are found to a greater extent in the simplest poem by Théophile than in all Malherbe's book; which fortunately is not very big, for God has willed by a special grace that men who write such verses as Malherbe's shall not be able to write many. It is true that there occur in the work of Théophile rather numerous passages in bad taste, but his bad taste is ingenious and amusing, sparkling, interesting, unexpected, after the fashion of that of the Cavalier Marini, and is due, in general, merely to a striving after novelty. Nor does Malherbe, dry as he is, possess by any means taste as good as it is customary to claim for him; even leaving aside "The Tears of Saint Peter," there are to be met with in his most famous poems lines excessively mannered and forced antitheses which are characteristic of the rhetorician. But his bad taste is dull, timid, and does not strike one at once; it is caused, not by exuberance as in Théophile, but by poverty and narrowness, and therefore less frequently finds an opportunity to exhibit itself. Théophile thoroughly understood this, and expressed it when he satirised the so-called poets who see in poetry simply material for prose, and consider a metaphor a piece of extravagance.

Théophile wrote at Chantilly three or four pieces of verse, in which, amid a great number of beauties, appear also an equally large number of faults of taste. These pieces are unfortunately too long to be quoted here. They are semi-mythological, semi-descriptive, and bear a strikingly personal and peculiar stamp. I know not whether you have ever seen in a museum one of those paintings in which Albano draws, upon a background so green that it shows black, a swarm of little white Cupids with tiny and very pink wings, or whether you have seen in the Louvre that charming water-colour by Decamps, representing women bathing. If you know either or both, you will have some notion of the delightful stanzas of Théophile. They are full of great trees, — mighty old oaks whose tops are rounded off with a plume of dark green, and which stand out against an ultra-marine sky dappled here and there with white and fleecy clouds; or terraces of brick with stone facings, great flowers blooming in marble vases, and gently sloping stairs with paunchy balustrades. Or, again, a Louis XIII park in all its magnificence: through the trees and behind the groves one catches a glimpse of tame deer white as snow; partridges and China pheasants walk familiarly up and down the walks with all their brood; brooks babble under arcades of foliage and fall into the pools and the fish-ponds, where lazily float in the sparkling water a few swans with curved neck and open wings. In the foreground, by way of figure, a handsome young woman, seated upon the tall, rich grass of the bank, is fishing in the reservoirs for gorgeous red and blue fishes; in the depths of the valleys, little plump, white, dimpled Cupids are playing together; and then a group of those lovely allegorical nymphs that painters gave us in those days, somewhat related to those of Rubens, more women than goddesses, with jutting breasts, broad, sweeping hips, plump, rounded arms, dimpled hands and cheeks, their golden hair floating behind them like a golden mantle, clear blue eyes, lips smiling and red as the poppy, shoulders and back lily white and polished as agate, shining in the green water as if they were so many submerged ivory statues. The waters are so clear and fresh in their framework of verdure that at night the stars descend from heaven to bathe in them. The valley is so solitary and discreet that even chaste Diana does not fear to bring thither her Endymion and to kiss his brow with her silver lips. It is a paradise that disgusts you with the terrestrial paradise; one of those lovely dreams which poets and painters dream in the evening when they watch the sun set behind the great chestnut-trees; dreams such as I have often dreamed at my window as I looked at the brick buildings and the slate roofs of my Place Royale and heard the sound of the water splashing in the fountains and the wind sighing through the trees.

It is difficult to state the rank which Théophile should occupy among the poets of the day. He died very young, and did not have time to carry out his ideas, at least in any but an incomplete fashion; but taking him as he was, it seems to us that, Régnier having passed away and Corneille not having yet arisen, he is the most remarkable poet of that period. He is better than Hardy and Porchère, than Bois-Robert, Maynard, Gombauld, and all the wits of that day, who, for the matter of that, are of more worth than most people seem to believe. Saint-Amant is the only one, in our opinion, who can at all equal him, but Saint-Amant is a great poet of splendidly bad taste and of a hot and luxurious facility, which conceals many diamonds in his dunghill; he lacks, however, the elevation and the melancholy of Théophile, though he makes up for it by a grotesqueness and a dash which Théophile did not possess. The one writes verse like a stout man, the other like a thin man,—that is the difference. As to Malherbe and Racan, although they are more irreproachable, they are unquestionably inferior to him, and we have always been amazed at the contempt and forgetfulness which have fallen since so long a time upon a name so remarkable in many respects, now that the reforms which he sought to introduce are accepted by every one. Perhaps that will be thought quite simple and natural. But we have got to go back to his day; and by what happened

later it may be seen that Théophile was of a progressive mind and ahead of his age. All truths have always had some poor Saint John the Precursor, who walks off the road, preaches in the desert, and dies at his work. Théophile was such an one; and if he were to return now to this world, there can be no doubt that he would be one of the brightest stars of the new Pleiades.

An interesting point to be noted is that Théophile is the first one who wrote a work in prose and verse. The subject is the death of Socrates, a subject which has been treated by Lamartine also, — a curious coincidence, if it happens to be unintentional.

And that is about all that I can tell you about my namesake. If you would like to know more, try to discover his complete works, published in a thick volume, rather badly printed and full of mistakes, which is sometimes to be found upon the parapet of the Pont Neuf and in the boxes of the second-hand booksellers. Besides the lines we have quoted, you will read others very beautiful, some remarkable sonnets, and enough odes and elegies to amply repay you for the twenty sous the book will have cost you.

SAINT-AMANT

WHAT is known of Saint-Amant's life amounts to very little; not because he led a quiet, uneventful life unworthy of the honour of biography, — far from it, — but Saint-Amant was a man of pleasure, accustomed to the life of the world, the life of society, very careless as to what posterity might do with his name; so he left no documents concerning himself. What Boileau says of him is a piece of pure invention, which does not deserve the least credit. The study of the literary history of the day proves readily that most of the other assertions of the famous critic are just as baseless, and that his judgments in matters of taste, hitherto considered final, are far from being always impartial and judicious.

Marc-Antoine Gérard, Sire of Saint-Amant, equerry, was born at Rouen in the year 1594. A number of writers, among them Ménage and Brossette, have stated that Saint-Amant was a gentleman glass-maker, but they are mistaken. Maynard's epigram does not mean that he was actually a gentleman glass-maker, but alludes to a glass-making privilege which he requested of Chancellor Séguier in 1638, as may be seen by a petition in verse which is found in the third part of his works. It is quite certain that Saint-Amant was not a glass-maker, but that he managed a fine large factory, the products of which were perfect enough to be purchased for royal residences. Besides, he would not have incurred the loss of the privileges of nobility had he himself blown glass. That was the resource of many poor gentlemen who had lost their fortunes. This particular business was not considered degrading, and did not deprive a man of the right to wear a sword. Exposing those who practised it to almost certain death on account of the burning air of the furnaces, it was not abased to the rank of peaceful and menial trades; for it required courage to take it up, and courage in France has always been counted the true and simple mark of nobility.

His father, a very distinguished naval officer, served Queen Elizabeth for twenty-two years, and was three years a prisoner in the Black Tower at Constantinople. His two brothers, one of whom served under Gustavus the Great, were killed while fighting the Turks. He was himself attached for a long time to the Count of Harcourt, a cadet of the house of Lorraine, whom he followed to La Rochelle, Savoy, Sardinia, and Gibraltar, where he behaved not as a poet, but as a brave man, or rather, both as a brave man and a poet, for he has written on this subject one of his best poems, which has a curious likeness to the poems of Victor Hugo, "Canaris" and "Navarino," and especially to de Vigny's "Sérieuse," no doubt a fortuitous coincidence. He was gentleman in waiting to Mary Louisa of Gonzaga, who had become Queen of Poland by her marriage to Ladislas Sigismond. In addition he enjoyed a pension of three thousand livres, which his friend, the Abbé de Marolles, had procured for him. Many noblemen, occupying some of the best positions at court, treated him with the most cordial familiarity. He was a member of the French Academy; he travelled a great deal and visited every court in Europe, and was received everywhere with distinction. This is a long way from the Homeric poverty, which proves nothing against his talent, but which the Parnassian

---

THE GROTESQUES

pedagogue dared to reproach him with in the following lines : —

“ Heaven on Saint-Amant bestowed but his vein,
His sole inheritance was the coat he wore ;
A bed and two requests his whole wealth formed, —
That is, to speak plain, Saint-Amant a beggar was.”

It is not true, either, that he came to court to make himself and his verse known. His works had already been printed for a long time, and his fine “Ode on Solitude” had gained him deserved reputation. Saint-Amant, whatever Boileau may say to the contrary, won much success. His peculiar qualities, and even his defects, were bound to attain this result in a literature yet permeated by the vigorous savour of Ronsard, and which the school of verse-making grammarians, founded by Malherbe and continued by Despréaux, was striving to despoil of its colour and individuality.

No doubt Saint-Amant was occasionally in straitened circumstances. That must have happened more than once in a life of travel and pleasure such as he led ; but such troubles are known to all rich men’s sons who have allowed Pactolus to slip too quickly between their fingers, and who are hard put to it while waiting for the payment of the first instalment of their allowance. Saint-Amant was a high liver in the fullest sense of the words ; a scientific and passionate drunkard, worthy of being a past master in the Order of Vineyards ; an ultra-gourmand, knowing good things better than any one else. He was a drunkard and a gourmand in most Gallic and Rabelaisian fashion. His deep respect, his almost tender veneration for cheese ripened green and blue, for a boar's-ear, for a smoked ox-tongue, for quince jam, hams, and other incentives to hard drinking is worth noting. He is quite like the Greek mentioned in "The Way to Success," who wished he had a neck as long as a stork's so that he might the longer enjoy the drinking of the September vintage, and who could not conceive of any happier fate in this or any other world than that of being a wine funnel. Saint-Amant enjoys a meal in a low tavern ; he enjoys a delicate supper in a reputable or a disreputable place, at Coiffier's, at the Île-au-Bois, and in Laplante-le-Borgne's tavern. He is there in his element ; his big, red face lights up with satisfaction, he calls for drink louder than Pantagruel did when he came into the world. He cries "Stake !" to this one and that, and never shirks drinking a health. Like the monk of Anniens, who grew wroth at not finding in Florence, the city of pictures and statues, a single eating-house, he swears madly at Evreux, which has twenty churches and not even a single tavern. It would be a mistake to suppose, however, that Saint-Amant is a vulgar drunkard who drinks for the sake of drink. Not at all; he is a drunkard after the fashion of Hoffman,—a poetic drunkard, who thoroughly understands an orgy and knows what fire may flash from the clinking of the glasses of two clever men. He understands that genius is but the intoxication of reason, and he gets drunk as often as he can. There are some men who have the power of separating at will their dream from reality, and of wholly abstracting themselves from their surroundings,—La Fontaine, for instance, who was absent-minded all his life. Others are compelled to have recourse to factitious means, to wine or opium, in order to put to sleep the prison jailer and to let their fancy rove. Of these is Saint-Amant. The inspiring beam reaches him much more brilliant and richly coloured through the rosy paunch of a wine flagon; his metaphor springs forth more boldly when it accompanies the cork of the bottle and strikes the ceiling at the same time with it. How vivid is his touch then, how brilliant, how rapid! He is no longer the same man; he is, as it were, a poet within a poet.

---

Now tell me, does not his inequality, full of flamboyant gleams and of deepest obscurity, of loftiest summits and deepest abysses, please you a great deal better than severe and worthy mediocrity, starless and cloudless, lighted everywhere with a pale artificial day resembling the light of candles? A writer such as he was, so hot, so full of life, with flesh and blood after the manner of Rubens, a mind at once German and Spanish, a man who had seen so many things and who painted with colours peculiar to himself what he had seen with his own eyes, could not in the least approve himself to Boileau with his sober and narrow mind; Boileau, who was an impassioned critic, and an ignorant one, save as regards ancient literature; Boileau, who was a poet speaking always of verse and of rime, and never of poetry; a skilful adapter in whose whole work there are practically not four lines which are absolutely his own; a short-sighted satirist who can see no other crimes in the world, no other vices to lash than mistakes of grammar or discordant lines. Therefore Boileau speaks most disdainfully of Saint-Amant in his "Art of Poetry." It is true that by way of compensation he grants him, in his "Reflections upon Longinus," genius enough for debauched work, but grudgingly.

Nevertheless, Saint-Amant is undoubtedly a very great and very original poet, worthy of being cited with the best of those whom France delights to honour. His rime is extremely rich, abundant, unexpected, and often unlooked for; his rhythm is harmonious, skilfully maintained and used; his style very varied, very picturesque, very full of fantasy, sometimes lacking taste, but always entertaining and novel. I shall show by analyses and quotations the character and the spirit he managed to impart to the smallest things; but before we estimate his literary value, it would be well to finally get rid of the biographical details. Fortunately, we have not much more to say. Saint-Amant was not a thorough Greek and Latin scholar, he says so himself. On the other hand, he knew English, Spanish, and Italian very well, and further, he was an excellent musician and played acceptably on the lute. He alludes several times, in the course of his works, — not very modestly, we are bound to say, — to his musical talent; in "Moses Saved," among others, in which, in order to give an idea of the exquisite song of the nightingale, he compares it to his charming performances on the lute; which would lead one to believe that he played not as a mere amateur, but as a consummate virtuoso. This fact is rather remarkable, too, in a French poet, for there are not many who are both musicians and poets, except perhaps in very distant times; for poetry and music, which might be believed to be sisters, are more antagonistic than is generally thought. There is but a very small number of musicians capable of re-writing the lines of a libretto when it does not happen to suit them; there is no poet that I am aware of, who can sing correctly the easiest of airs. Victor Hugo particularly abhors the opera, and even grinding organs; Lamartine flees when a piano is opened; Alexandre Dumas sings about as well as Mlle. Mars or the late Louis XV of harmonious memory; and I, if it be permissible to mention hyssop after having spoken of cedars, I am bound to confess that the screaming of a saw and the scraping of the fourth string by the cleverest violinist produce exactly the same effect upon me. This is a remark which no one has made before me, and which I have verified so far as the circle of my acquaintances has enabled me to do so. I give it to the public, and shall be very glad if some scientific man will take hold of it and experiment on it on a larger scale. It would help to reduce music to its true rank ; for people affect to look upon it as if it were poetry itself, though music is addressed more particularly to the senses, and poetry to thought, which is a very different thing. Music affects animals. There are dilettante sporting dogs who go into fits when they hear the swell organ played, and poodles who follow street singers, howling in the most harmonious and enchanting fashion. But if you read the finest verses in the world to these animals, they scarcely take notice of them.

---

---

Besides his talent as a lute player, Saint-Amant also possessed the gift of reading his verses admirably well ; so very well that he completely concealed their defects, and there was no way of telling the best from the good and the mediocre from the worst. Gombaud, often deceived by this magic power and annoyed at being always caught, wrote an epigram on the subject which is not to be read literally any more than any other epigram : —

“ Your verse is beautiful when you speak it,
But it is worthless when I read it.
You cannot always speak it, —
Write some, then, so I can read it.”

He was one of the first members of the Academy, in which he was succeeded by the Abbé Cassaigne.

---

He was granted the privilege of not making a speech on being received, on condition that he would take charge of the burlesque and jovial part of the famous Dictionary, the subject of so many jokes; and certainly he was better fitted than any one else to do this successfully, both in theory and from experience, for his vocabulary in this line is very extensive and very picturesque. His writings show that the French language is neither so prudish nor so prim as people would have it, and that, just as well as any other language on earth, it can find the right word for the right thing, and can perfectly well say what it does not care to conceal.

In 1656 Queen Christina, when the members of the Academy were presented to her, readily recognised Saint-Amant, and expressed to him the pleasure she felt in seeing him a member of the illustrious company. This happened five years before his death. It would seem, therefore, that he was not so utterly discredited as Boileau chooses to affirm.

Having begun his poem of "Moses," he travelled on to Warsaw on purpose to show to Mary de Gonzaga, to whom the work is dedicated, the part which he had already written. He was stopped at Saint-Omer,

THE GROTESQUES

as may be seen by the following extract from the prefatory letter : —

“ This great favour, Madam, did not confine itself only to aiding the work, but also aided the workman himself ; for when I was going to Poland to pay my most faithful duty to your Majesty, and to bring you what I had written of my poem, I was arrested by the garrison of Saint-Omer. No doubt that if I had not said at once that I had the honour to be one of your gentlemen in waiting, and had not been protected by such splendid and strong armour, I should have been unable to parry that stroke of misfortune. I should have risked the loss of my life, and ‘ Moses Saved ’ would have been ‘ Moses Lost.’ But the men who arrested me, fierce and insolent though they were, respected in the servant the greatness of the mistress ; the splendour of so famous a name made them retain the bolt they were ready to launch at me, and their eyes, seeing that name shine like a fair star on the first of the books of my work, were so dazzled by it that they dared no longer look upon it. Fear lest some profane curiosity might have made a copy thereof led me to resolve henceforth to change its aspect and the whole plot. The desire of accomplishing this purpose never left me during my trip. I even tried on several occasions, but in adverse places, to carry it out ; but I discovered that the Muses of the Seine were so delicate that they had been unable to follow me on this long trip ; that the fatigue of the journey had upset them, and that I absolutely required a solitary and natural retreat where these lovely virgins could dwell, so that I might carry out what I projected. That was why I returned to France, Madam, and if I have done wrong in so returning, I trust your Majesty will graciously forgive me, since it is due to that fact that I have better ordered and completed what I would never have undertaken save to contribute in some way to your Majesty's diversion."

In some lines which he wrote he seems to manifest a desire to become naturalised in Poland, but Saint-Amant did not become Saint-Amanski; he returned to France and rewrote "Moses" under the title of "Heroic Idyl," a title which drew down upon itself sharp criticism, in spite of the Academy's approval, which the author rests upon in the Preface, remarkable, both from the point of view of style and as containing the literary opinions of the poet. Here are a few extracts from it:—

"I have introduced episodes to fill the scene, if I may so speak; and without observing fully the rules of the ancients, which I nevertheless revere and am not ignorant of, I made wholly new rules for myself because of the novelty of my invention, believing that reason alone would be a sufficiently powerful authority to justify them. For indeed, provided a thing is judicious and suits times, places, and persons, what matters it whether Aristotle has or has not approved it? Stars have been discovered in these later ages which, had he seen them, would have made him see other things than he has said, and our modern philosophy is not always in accordance with his in all its principles and definitions.”

A little farther on, apologising for the use of some obsolete words, he says : —

“A tall and venerable antique chair sometimes looks very well and maintains its rank in a room adorned with the most fashionable and splendid furniture. For my part, whatever may be said in praise of the Greek and Latin tongues, however rich they may be and whatever advantages they may have over ours, I cannot but believe that Homer and Virgil considered them poor and incomplete in comparison with the richness and abundance of their thoughts, and that they always had in their own minds some hidden images which they could not express with their pen. That is my view ; — some other man will express his.

“I foresee also that those who care only for imitations of the ancients, who make idols of them, and who would have men servilely bound to say nothing but what the ancients have said — as if the human mind were not free to produce anything new — will affirm that they would think more highly of what I might have plagiarised from some one else than of anything which I could give them out of my own resources. It is true that I do not greatly enjoy adorning myself with other people’s feathers, as did the crow in Horace, and that usually I confine myself to making bouquets of small flowers gathered in my own garden.

“I should like, by way of conclusion, to say a word about my style and the method I have followed in writing my verses, if time allowed me. I would say that I am not of the same opinion as those who insist that the meaning should always be completed at the end of the second and fourth lines. The measure must be interrupted occasionally, in order to diversify it more, for it causes to the ear a certain weariness which can only arise from continuous uniformity. I would say that this is what is called in musical language changing the intervals or the rhythm in order to return to it more agreeably. I should call it the difference between narrative and descriptive style; and after I had said all that at great length and with the requisite detail, I should not have said the hundredth part of what may be said about it.”

These lines show to which side belonged Saint-Amant in the great quarrel of the ancients and the moderns which made so much noise at that time. His remarks, which appear to-day of patriarchal simplicity and almost stupid, so true are they, were in those days singularly bold. He was indeed courageous, and launched point-blank the most unheard-of paradoxes. What! so long as a thing is suited to persons, times, and places, it matters little whether Aristotle approved of it or not? But that is monstrous; you must be a very wicked man to maintain such heresy. Men have been burned for less. In one and the same preface you preach liberty and the progress of the human mind and you value a native flower which blooms, fresh and perfumed, in the sunshine of inspiration, more than all those artificial, foreign plants transplanted with great difficulty from the ancient into the hothouses of the modern Parnassus? You prefer your plumage, such as it is, to the plumage of the peacock, so rich and varied, in which you could disguise yourself? You affirm that Homer and Virgil must have complained of the poverty of the Greek and Latin tongues? You preach in favour of varied verse with mobile caesura and irregular cadence, neither more nor less than a modern young Romanticist? I am bound to say that you deserve the ferule strokes which Boileau deals out to you here and there with his learned hand in his "Satires" and in his "Art of Poetry."

"Moses Saved" was exceedingly successful, although it is far from being an irreproachable work; but the descriptive portions are extremely brilliant and compensate for many defects. Description is what Saint-Amant excels in. His numerous voyages to

---

Italy, England, America, the Canaries, Spain, Africa, the Mediterranean, and elsewhere enabled him to vary his palette infinitely and to enrich it with original and striking colours.

“I feel sure,” he says, “that those who have not travelled as much as I have, and who are not acquainted with all the rarities of nature because they have not seen almost all of them as I have, will not regret my telling them of some of these. The description of the smallest things is my peculiar property ; it is to this that I most frequently devote my little talent.”

On his return from Poland he began to live in a wiser and better-ordered manner. He lodged in the Rue de Seine. In spite of his disorderly life, he had always been naturally pious at bottom, and a fine religious feeling breathes in some of the poems which he wrote towards the end of his life. That is the only period when Boileau's charge of poverty seems to have some basis. It appears that he lacked money to pay his host, who, for the matter of that, did not ask for it, having known him for a long time and aware that he would never cheat him. This caused him to sink into a state of melancholy, which the death of that very host and the fear of finding himself without means increased still further, and which led him to his grave after a few days' illness in the year 1666. Some say that the failure of a poem in praise of Louis XIV, entitled "The Speaking Moon," on which he had built great hopes, was the cause of his death. This is scarcely likely. A man has to be a Kirke White or a Keats — that is to say, to be exceedingly simple and not more than twenty — to die of such a cause. The susceptibility of our older authors is not quite so morbid, however deep may be their poetical vanity. Now, Saint-Amant was far from being a beginner, for he was then about sixty-seven years of age.

It remains, in order to complete the physical and material picture of the poet, to draw his portrait, after having told of his life and death. It is not a difficult matter, and can be done in a few words. Saint-Amant was big, stout, short, with soft eyes, bright complexion, fair, curly hair like a German count, a round, open face, red lips, and a pair of curling moustaches. A near relative of Falstaff, preferring a cask of claret to all the Phyllises upon earth, he calls himself repeatedly "good, big Saint-Amant," paunch, hogshead, barrel, and other like epithets which would be scarcely suitable to a poet who had starved to death. His stoutness had become somewhat proverbial in the company he frequented, but although he was big and stout, he was not stupid — far from it. Terburg's landsknecht, who is drinking out of a huge glass in a courtesan's room, may give our reader, or readers (for we hope we shall have more than one), a very correct idea of the figure and costume of our poet. A glance at that picture will teach him more than all we could say, supposing, which, to say the least, is doubtful, he is curious to know accurately the appearance of a discredited and utterly forgotten author.

Saint-Amant, although a stout drunkard, is nevertheless not exclusively a bacchanalian poet after the manner of Panard, Désaugiers, and the members of the Caveau. He can write something more lofty than a drinking song, and he often exhibits a fine lyric power. His "Solitude," which was published a great many times and translated into Latin verse, is, for the time at which it appeared, a very beautiful piece of work. It contains in germ the greater part of the literary revolution which took place later. In it, nature is studied directly, and not through the work of previous masters. There is nothing in the so-called classic poets of that day so fresh in colour, so transparent in light, so vague and melancholy in reverie,

THE GROTESQUES

so calm and sweet in manner, as the qualities which make the "Ode on Solitude" so charming. The poet is wandering in a lonely place where the noise of the world does not reach him, and he describes what he sees, not in the dry, geometric manner of the Abbé Delille, but with a freedom, a skilfulness of touch, and a feeling which reveal a great master. It is scarcely possible to do better in the picturesque style. There are great trees which witnessed the birth of time, that seem still young, so green is their foliage, so cool and humid is their shade. They bow their heads gently as they listen to the warbling of the nightingale, as do dilettanti at the Italian opera; they yield up to the rosy fingers of the breeze their thick crowns, and cradle in their arms the nests of doves and bullfinches. The scented hawthorn, beloved of spring, showers its silvery snows upon the emerald sward. From the summit of a precipitous mount, whose gullied sides show ochre and chalk, falls a fierce torrent which races madly through the green, wild valley, and which soon, its fury spent, meanders through the high, thick grass like an azure-backed serpent and makes a crystal throne for the local Naiad. Further on, a pool edged with beam-trees, alders, and willows ; the gladioli and the reeds quiver in the wind ; the timid frog leaps and plunges into the water when any one draws near ; the heron picks at its feathers, careless of the hunter ; innumerable aquatic birds sport, and swim, and play together. On the motionless surface of the waters, into which no traveller has ever dipped his hand to drink and which no oar has ever rippled, floats the water lily. Newton Fielding, the Raphael of ducks, would not have done any better with his rich and sparkling pencil. The scene changes again. It is now an old, ruined castle in which wizards and witches hold their sabbath revels and where dwell hobgoblins. The osprey sings its funereal song to the dancing imps ; adders and owls nestle in walls which the slug soils with its silvery slime. The floor of the highest room has fallen into the cellar ; ivies grow on the hearths. On the gibbet of accursed timber the wind rattles the skeleton of a poor, rejected lover, who has hanged himself in despair ; —and, with due regard to Boileau, I think the suicide's body is admirably placed. After having wandered for some time through the ruins in which pale Morpheus sleeps in the arms of Idlesse, lying upon sheaves of poppies, the poet ascends a steep cliff, the brow of which seems to seek the realms of mist, and from that point he watches the wide-stretching sea which bears in and carries away the pebbles on the shore. He sees sponges, seaweed, ambergris, or bodies of stranded monsters floating about; he sees the heavy Tritons rising above the tumultuous waves, sounding their trumps and calming the storm. Then comes this fine strophe, marvellously like the one in Victor Hugo's "Fire of Heaven." Saint-Amant is speaking of the sea:—

"Sometimes, most limpid, it resembles a floating mirror, and reflects the skies within its waters. The sun shows so clear within it, as it contemplates its fair face, that one doubts for a time whether it is the sun or its image, for at first it seems that it has fallen from the skies."

The poem ends with a few witty strophes of envoi.

The ode entitled "The Contemplator," although less known and less frequently quoted than the "Ode to Solitude," contains passages of great beauty and of the same general character. It is a reverie about everything and nothing,—about a passing fish, a cormorant that flies away, a fluttering moth, a floating halcyon's nest,—mingled with religious reflections and pious aspirations. The poem is addressed to a prelate, Philippe Cospeau, Bishop of Nantes.

SAINT-AMANT

This, however, is but one side of Saint-Amant's talent. The grotesque, that indispensable element which small, narrow minds have striven to reject from the domain of art, abounds in his verse, and squirms at the end of his rimes as fantastically as the snakes and monsters on the Gothic cornices and under the porches of the old cathedrals. He is less playful in this style than is Scarron, but the strong, bold colour which the latter lacks imparts to Saint-Amant's grotesque a much greater artistic value. His outline is clean and sharp after the fashion of Calot, with something of excessive and strange which gives to the figures he draws a family resemblance to the Tartaglia, the Brighelli, and the Pulchinelli of the Lorraine engraver. Van Ostade would think this interior, sketched in black and white, not unworthy of himself. It is the apartment of a debauchee. The piece is too long and too free in speech to allow us to quote it; we shall summarise its chief features in a few lines.

After having climbed high enough to lead to the belief that one has got to the third heaven into which Saint Paul was caught up, a door is reached where a rat could only get through by crawling. The room is so cold that in mid-summer one freezes in it as in December, and a fire has to be lighted. A little rascal of a valet returns laden with faggots which he has stolen in town; but the smoke spreads through the room and makes the company shed more tears than if every one had lost all his relatives. It is in this yellow and red smoke that the poet draws up the inventory of the furniture owned by the debauchee, and there is not much of it, as will be believed. An old basket serves both as chair, footstool, and armchair, so that if one man is seated and thus saves wearing out the soles of his boots, the other stands up straight like a fir tree or a paschal candle. The broken lute-case is used alternately as a trunk and a pillow; a bottle takes the place of the candlestick; the owner's rapier is equally useful as a spit and as a knife. On the mantelpiece are to be seen heaps of ends of old pipes, a dice-box with its three dice, and the "Hours" of Robert Benière for the use of lansquenet players. As for linen, web is not lacking, but unfortunately it is cobwebs, and the rascal's whole outfit consists of a comb in a sock, — the comb itself being nothing but the backbone of a fish. As for perfumes and scented powders, it is no use looking for them there; the ashes serve him fer powder, and for pistachio he has a piece of garlic. His nails, longer than his fingers, answer the purpose of Scotch toothpicks. He has turned a pair of compasses into a curling iron, a paving stone into an andiron, and a ruff into a collar; and when he is tired — tired, not drunk — with debauch, he says good-night to the tankards, and, by merely rolling over to the left, he turns his tablecloth into a sheet and his table into a bed. The wall forms his bed-curtain, and the moon shining through a rough window, is his night-light. Nevertheless, our two epicureans enjoy in this delightful place the best meal which can be eaten between the two poles.

Undoubtedly the picture is not noble in tone, but it is painted with warmth, and those who do not exclaim, as did Louis XIV on seeing paintings by Teniers, “Take away these deformities!” will study it, I hope, with some pleasure, as well as the sketch of a similar subject, — a sonnet entitled “The Gluttons,” which is full of a vivacity, a feeling and a natural touch not often met with in French poetry. The volume contains many other pieces like this one. What think you of this portrait, for instance?—You see that man who is paying his court to the bronze King on the platform of the Pont Neuf, his owl's eyes, his pointed beard, his long nose? The crowd collects to watch him. One man thinks he is an orang-outang, another a werewolf, another an ostrich, and another, one of the camels which M. de Nevers brought home. Some say that it is a pitcher, and others a clock-hammer, which has escaped from some steeple.—It is a poet!—Would you like to know how a poet was dressed in those days? He wears a black felt hat, grown white by dint of wear, with a greasy cord around it and adorned with a cock's feather. His doublet grins at everybody and smiles at every seam. If you want to wish any one a long life, wish that he may live as long as that doublet; he will attain the age of Methuselah. A short cloak of red camlet adorns him at all seasons, winter and summer. A narrow garter, made of a piece of frieze, cuts across his vest and takes the place of a scarf. There hangs from it a foil, by way of sword, which cuts into the ground behind him as if it were the coulter of a plough. To tramp through the mud he puts on his stockingless feet a pair of old boots, one an oyster fisherman's, very broad and of black leather, the other with a white knee-piece of Russia leather; the one with a short flat toe, the other with a twisted flap. His left heel is armed with a small spur, after the English fashion; he wears nothing on the right, save a string, somewhat like Gringoire in "Notre-Dame de Paris," which is intended to fasten the sole of the boot, ever ready to part company with the sole of his foot. As for his breeches, they are of imitation yellow satin, the one leg too long, the other too short. They are the remains of a ballet costume which some gallant gave him of yore with a quarter crown, for writing the anagram of the princess the said gallant was in love with. This is certainly a pretty poor costume, and we must hope for the honour of poetry that the colouring of the picture is somewhat exaggerated; but it is an excellent caricature and compels an involuntary laugh, like grimacing marionettes.

It is especially in "Rome Ridiculous" that his buffoon wit is most original and entertaining. It is a well deserved lesson given jokingly to enthusiastic tourists. You ought to see how he makes fun of the much vaunted Tiber, calling it a wretched little river, a barefooted river, a river of no account, which actually indulges in bridges as if they were needed to cross it. What, is that the Tiber, which one expects to see with its crystal wave, its golden sand, a porcelain urn and a beautiful wreath of water-lilies on its head? Why, it is only a brooklet which a dwarf could walk across; a duck could use one foot only for swimming, the other would be on dry land. The golden sand is nothing but vile-smelling mud, the crystal wave a thin streamlet of dirty water, the porcelain urn an earthenware pitcher, the wreath of water-lilies a woollen cap full of holes, and the god is nothing but a porter. And the poor monuments of antiquity — how he does treat them! Never did any one speak so irreverently of them. He roars with laughter at the enthusiasm of antiquarians for heaps of shapeless stone fit only to be dens of toads and scorpions; he laughs consumedly at the Tritons of the Piazza Navone which powder their wigs with the spray of water, and which, with the jet of liquid which springs from their mouths, look more like monkeys smoking than marine divinities. And how sharply he speaks about you, beautiful Roman women! In his opinion you have no right to the reputation which your charms enjoy; you possess neither beauty, wit, nor talent. You are as dark as gipsies, greasy-haired, shapeless, big-headed, and flat-footed. Your husbands are very wrong to lock you up. There is no need that a duenna should be constantly at your heels and should duplicate your shadow; you are quite capable of guarding yourselves, and your ugliness is a sufficient duenna. The cardinals themselves are not safe from his quizzing. He describes in the same comical fashion their great, old-fashioned coaches with the gilding worn off and drawn by thin-flanked mules, their ragged pages, and their shoeless footmen. O descendants of the wolf's whelps, how he does take you to task for your servility, your avarice, your meanness, your rascality! How he paints all your rabble which asks for tips, this one because he looked at you, the other because he said, "God bless you"! How he reproaches you for your monstrous admiration for Venus Callipyge! How he laughs at your music, at your serenades which are more discordant than an amateur concert! Hector Berlioz could not have said any more. And your great, soft felt hats with their plumes that flutter like owls preparing to take flight, your long, rusty swords, your worn velvet, your tarnished galloons! How pitilessly he lashes you! A single thing in Italy finds favour in his eyes,—it is polenta with cheese and Montefiascone wine.

THE GROTESQUES

You must confess that Saint-Amant was a man very much in advance of his age.

The inseparable friend of old Father Farré and of the pale and gloomy Bilot who blew smoke out of his nostrils, he can, when he chooses, rise to the most serious and loftiest style, as witness these lines from his "Moses":—

"The insolent barbarian, armed with an assegai still dripping with blood from many a wound, steps forth first, and with his muscular arm hurling it at Moses, touches his hair. The javelin thrown in vain hurtles past like thunder, and quivering, plunges more than a foot into the ground. The Egyptian turns pale at missing his blow, and disappointed rage in his pallor is shown. Moses, agile and firm, at once charges him, and with a steel that gleams and death foretells, dazzles him and strikes a dreadful blow, which he hears in terror whistle as it comes. He avoids it, draws back, and showing his skill, springs, sword in hand, towards the Hebrew who presses upon him. The one charges, the other guards and with the sword fends off the maddened edge which threatens him again. Sparks fly fast from the striking swords; now one stands firm, now the other struggles; and although in this fight their bodies are unarmed, they are none the less eager to assault. Both tall, both strong, they hope for victory. Eye, foot, and hand follow and unite, the arm works with the heart, the skill answers the wish, and to take breath neither has time. Tricks and turns, surprises and feints, and all that fencing in its quickest strokes has of bold, terrible, abrupt, and cruel, is practised by each in this bitter duel. But though the pagan valiantly behaves, though skilful he appears, he cannot prevent his enemy's sword, dreadful in his sight, wounding him grievously in many a place. With pain and shame maddened, he blasphemes, grows angry, howls, and with bitter spite casting on Moses a look of wrath, strikes swiftly at his head. Moses, who watches him and who sees him lunge far from the protection of his sword, charges him, head down. The sword strikes a pine and marks it with mistaken blow. The tree, struck, cracks and trembles with horror. The pagan, astounded to find his sword has left his hand through this great effort, turns quick towards Moses and on him springing, with arms and legs at once enfolds him. Moses receives him. They clutch in desperate struggle, recall their vigour, shake each other, breathe hard and grate their teeth; their clothes they tear and their burning eyes look like rubies strange. Each tries a thousand turns, and renewing his strength, twists his foe and by him is twisted; their postures they change, with labour they burn, and the sweat with which their bodies is covered shows that every muscle, vein, and nerve is on a strain and swollen with effort. My agitated eyes see in their struggle their footprints mingling fast together on the sands. The pagan's valour begins to ebb, his strength by his wrath is in vain sustained. He yields, and the Hebrew, ending the fight, presses him close, makes him groan, raises him, throws him down, presses with one knee his panting breast. Seeing him draw a mortal dagger, which the ardour of the fight made him forget, with one hand he seizes his weakened wrist, with the other his fingers opens; then, untwisting them, drags away the knife, turns down the point and thrice drives it up to the silver hilt, exquisitely graved, into its master's breast."

Those who care for poetry may compare this passage with that in the battle of Don Paëz and Etur de Guadarré in the "Tales of Spain and Italy." It is an interesting comparison to make on account of the similarity of action and style.

M. de Vigny would perhaps be much astonished to find in Saint-Amant the idea, thought so charming, of the tear of Christ received in a diamond urn. It is there, however, and very well developed, only it is a tear of Jocabed.

"Smarra, or The Nightmare" has been exploited by Saint-Amant as well as by Charles Nodier, and in his works are found many fantastic pieces which are equal to the strangest thing of this kind in English and in German. "Martin" alone would form a Biblical picture more dazzling than that of the bath of the Princess of Termuth:—

“She descends into the stream upon steps of agate and mother-of-pearl, between two pyramids, under a sapphire-coloured canopy. A golden grating gives passage to the silver tide in which great trees dip their boughs. She emerges from the bath, and her form is reflected from column to column on the polished porphyry like the shadow of a swan on a lake.”

I think that it is enough to make us forgive Saint-Amant his famous line, —

“The fishes, amazed, behold them pass.”

IV CYRANO DE BERGERAC

CERTAIN physiologists pretend that they can diagnose cleverness, courage, and all the noble qualities by means of the nose, and that no one can be a great man unless he has a large nose. Many feminine physiologists also deduce from the size of that worthy part of the face a most advantageous augury. However this may be, Socrates was flat-nosed; but Socrates confesses that he was born with the most vicious tendencies, and that it was perhaps due to mere laziness on his part that he did not become a great rascal. Cæsar and Napoleon had a regular eagle's-beak in the middle of their faces; old Pierre Corneille had a highly developed nasal promontory. Look at medals and portraits, — you will find in heroes the nose proportioned to the greatness of their glory — and there are no catarrhal ones. The reason that negroes are usually stupid is not because they are flat-skulled — the skull has nothing to do with it; it is because they are as flat-nosed as death itself. Elephants, which are endowed with so much intelligence as to make many a poet blush, are indebted for the cleverness one notices in them to the prodigious extension of their nose, for their trunk is a real nose five or six feet in length. Not so bad, is it?

THE GROTESQUES

This nosology may appear to be rather out of place at the beginning of a literary criticism, but on opening the first volume of Bergerac, in which is to be seen a copperplate portrait of him, the gigantic size and the strange shape of his nose so drew my attention that I have dwelt on it longer than the thing was worth, indulging in the profound reflections which have just been read, and in many others which I spare the reader.

This most extraordinary nose adorns a face seen in three-quarters, the lesser side of which is entirely covered by it. It forms in the centre a mountain which appears to me likely to be, next to the Himalayas, the highest mountain in the world. Then it dashes down towards the mouth, which it adumbrates heavily, like the trunk of a tapir or the beak of a bird of prey. At its very extremity it is divided into two parts by a line not unlike, though more marked,

CYRANO DE BERGERAC

that which divides the cherry lip of Anne of Austria, the fair queen with the long ivory hands. This gives the effect of two distinct noses on the same face, which is more than custom allows. Some hunting-dogs also present this peculiarity ; it is a mark of great kindliness of temper. The portraits of Saint Vincent of Paul, or of the Deacon Paris, exhibit the most characteristic types of this sort of structure. Only, Cyrano's nose is less pasty, less fleshy in its contour ; it is fuller of bone and of cartilage, it has more flat and more shining spots ; it is more heroic. The rest of the face, so far as this splendid nose permits one to see it, struck me as being graceful and regular. The eyes are oval-shaped and very dark, which gives them surprising fire and gentleness ; the eyebrows are thin, though very marked ; the moustache, somewhat fine and scant, is lost in the shadow of the corners of the mouth ; the hair, dressed in the most modish fashion, falls gracefully on either side of the face. But for his nose he would really be a handsome fellow. This unfortunate nose afforded Cyrano de Bergerac an opportunity of displaying his valour in duels which were repeated almost every day. If any one committed the mistake of looking at him and exhibiting the least astonishment

at the sight of such a nose, he forthwith had to appear on the ground; and as the duels of that time did not finish up with a breakfast, and Cyrano was a skilful swordsman, a man ran the risk of receiving a good sword-thrust in his belly and of coming off with his doublet adorned with more buttonholes than it had before. In a very short time, therefore, everybody agreed that the shape of Cyrano's nose was exceedingly fine, and scarce any but a yokel not yet versed in the ways of the town bethought himself of passing a joke upon it. Needless to add that a fierce lunge driven home soon taught the joker the amenities of life, if it did not lay him out dead. So far there is nothing to be said; every man is bound to have his nose respected; but Cyrano, not content with killing or grievously wounding those who did not appear satisfied with his olfactory organ, sought to establish as a principle that everybody ought to have a big nose, and that flat-nosed people were shapeless abortions, creatures scarcely more than blocked out, of whom nature was ashamed. It is in "The Trip to the Moon" that he brings forward this strange paradox. In the moon, if a flat-nosed child is born, care is taken, lest, when he grows up, he should perpetuate this abominable de-formity, to secure him a life-long soprano voice and to fit him to enter without danger the seraglio of the Grand Seigneur. Merit is measured by the length of the nose; according to the size of the nose one is placed higher or lower. Without a nose, according to Cyrano, there can be no valour, no wit, no cleverness, no passion, nothing of what constitutes man. The nose is the abode of the soul; it forms the distinction between man and the brute, for no animal has a nose shaped like man's. Ah, Master Savinien Cyrano de Bergerac! it seems to me that you are rather too plainly exemplifying the fable of the fox that had lost its tail.

I do not know if the worth of the mind and passion depend upon the shape of the nose. The fact remains that Cyrano was valiant, clever, passionate, and that is the best proof he can give in support of his system. Of course it remains to be ascertained whether he was valiant, witty, and passionate because he had a big nose, or whether he had a big nose because he was valiant, witty, and passionate. Does the hen come from the egg, or the egg from the hen? — that is the question. Let those who are more learned than myself decide.

Savinien Cyrano de Bergerac, the owner of that

THE GROTESQUES

---

prodigious nose, was born in 1620 at the Château of Bergerac in Périgord. His father sent him to be educated by a poor country priest who took boarders and brought up, as well as he could, the sons of the country gentry. Cyrano did not make much progress under him, for he did not in the least believe in the teaching of the worthy man, whom he looked upon as a thoroughly pedantic and perfect Aristotelian ass. It was enough that his teacher should say a thing was white for Cyrano to believe that it was black, and do exactly the contrary of what he was told. It was under this man, no doubt, that he acquired that horror of pedants and of all that smacked of the college principal, which he preserved all his life, and which suggested to him so many piquant epigrams against the Sidias, whatever their gown and their colour, who seek to ascertain, like that of Théophile de Viau, si odor in pomo est forma aut accidens. He constantly refers to their gormandising propensity, their drunkenness, their awkwardness, their dirt, their avarice, their crass ignorance, their stupid pride, their obstinacy, to all their small, shameful vices, which partake at once of the vices of children and of old men. He describes in most spirited fashion their dirty nails, their hands unwashed since the deluge, their greasy hair full of vermin, their snuffling noses always brown with snuff, their tone of superiority, their ways at once insolent and servile. A sketch of a Christian brother by Charlet does not surpass his in accuracy and simplicity. You may be sure that the Metaphrastes and the Pancraces of Poquelin are near relatives of the Sidiases of Théophile and of the pedants of Cyrano. They unquestionably have taught the same class in some provincial college; they have the same birch in their hand, they talk the same jargon, they all swear by Aristotle and his learned cabal. The question of knowing whether one ought to say the form or the figure of a hat is at least as good as si odor in pomo.

CYRANO DE BERGERAC

Cyrano complained so much and so frequently to his father of his master's incapacity that the former, a worthy country gentleman, who cared much more for his dogs than for his children, took him away from the priest, and careless of anything else than good living, sent the boy alone to Paris at an age when nascent passions are most to be feared, especially in highly strung natures like that of young Savinien.

What was to be expected happened, — Bergerac was carried away with the stream of the mad and turbulent

---

youth of that day. He gave himself up to debauch with the ardour of a lad of eighteen, who sees Paris for the first time and who has come from out a little country presbytery, from a quiet, discreet house, sober, methodical, and silent, almost always half asleep under the shadow of its grey walnut-trees between the church and the graveyard, ruled by a doting priest and a bleary-eyed, grumbling servant. Wine and women, those two delightful things which smile so sweetly upon our young fancies, very nearly wrecked him completely on leaving this life of discipline and self-mastery. It was the days of those handsome Spanish and Italian adventuresses, proud, voluptuous creatures, who loved with equal passion gold, blood, and perfumes, pale as amber, supple as the willow, strong as steel, with slightly arched noses, with lips disdainfully turned up at the corners and seeming to scorn, eyes moist and flashing, hair thick and wavy, almost regal hands full of dimples, slender fingers whiter than the ivory of their fans. It was the heyday of the beautiful, poetic courtesan, the day when balconies were scaled, the day of silken ladders and ballets and masquerades, of that Spanish gallantry at once grave and extravagant, so devoted that it was actually stupid, so ardent that it turned to ferocity, the days of sonnets and society verses, of great sword-thrusts, deep draughts, and frightful gambling. Men threw their lives away, scattered their souls to every wind as though they knew not what to do with them; every minute they staked their existence on the cast of a die; they fought on their own account; they served as seconds to others rather than remain with their arms crossed. A man looked at you — forthwith a duel; somebody did not look at you — another duel; one man insulted you, another despised you; and all that without braggadocio, with an admirable, free and easy nonchalance, as if it were merely a question of draining a glass of hippocras. What a waste of courage! The making of a hundred thousand heroes scattered at the corners of squares at night under some lantern.

Cyrano managed to be called “the Intrepid” by a society thus constituted; he, still a youth, just arrived from Périgord, fresh from the home of a poor country priest! It was a splendid start.

It was already the fashion to pretend to be impious and strong-minded. I will not affirm that Cyrano indulged in this ridicule; nevertheless, he was accused of it, like most of the wits of the day. What served to support this accusation were some passages of his tragedy of “Agrippina,” in which atheistic maxims like the following are openly and vigorously expressed : —

THE GROTESQUES

Terentius. And yet thou knowest Rome is monarchical,
That aristocratic now it can no more remain,
And that the Roman eagle will find it hard to soar
When more than one master it has to upbear.
Respect and fear the dread thunder of the gods.

Sejanus. The bolt in winter never strikes the earth ;
So for six months at least I may laugh at gods ;
When these are past, I make my peace with heav’n.

Terentius. All thy projects the gods shall overthrow.

Sejanus. A little smoking incense atones for many deeds.

Terentius. Who fears them —

Sejanus. Fears naught. These creatures of terror,
These splendid nothings men ignorantly adore,
Thirsting for the blood of animals slain,
These gods whom man has made, who made not man,
These absurd upholders of the strongest states, —
I tell you, Terentius, who fears them, fears naught.

Terentius. But if they existed not, could this great globe —

Sejanus. Nay, if they did exist, would I still live ? —

And this other passage in which the immortality of the soul is denied : —

Agrippina. You are then proof to a sight so sad ?

Sejanus. ’T is only death, and no wise moves me.

CYRANO DE BERGERAC

---

Agrippina. But the uncertainty as to what is after death —

Sejanus. Was I unhappy before I ever was?

One hour after death the vanished soul

Shall be what it was an hour ere life.

But all this proves nothing. It is not the poet who says these things; they are spoken by the characters whom he has put on the stage, a distinction which it is easy to make and which people never will make, I know not why. In the same way most thoroughly zealous Christians who had just communicated at Easter, and had carefully abstained from eating meat on Fridays and Saturdays, have been accused of irreligion and atheism. Evil-mindedness profits by all this. A few verses treacherously separated from the context are quoted, and forthwith an honest man, true-hearted and a genius, is proclaimed an atheist and a free-thinker by obscure pedants who ought to have a whole alphabet branded on their shoulders, and who, from the mud in which they lie, never cease to croak at every renown, filling in literature the office of the sworn insulters of the Roman triumphs. Cyrano has put the maxims I have quoted in the mouth of Sejanus, a scoundrel rotten with vice, one of those monstrous colossi of infamy who terrified the world in the days of the Roman decadence. It is quite natural that he should speak thus; atheism is but a trifle to such a man. Besides, he is a pagan, and the gods he insults are but demons, according to all the fathers of the Church. To maintain that there are no gods is thoroughly orthodox, and it seems to me strange that a Christian poet should be accused of atheism because he makes a pagan deny the divinity of Jupiter. It is one more anomaly to be added to the immense repertory of the eccentricities of the human mind. Besides, it has always been so. Byron takes for the heroes of his poems corsairs and murderers; so people insist that he himself is a murderer and a vampire. There are many men who are not yet quite certain that the author of "Han d'Islande" and of the "Condemned Man's Last Day" did not eat human flesh and did not die on the scaffold. This method of attributing to the poet what he makes his creations say would involve hanging high all tragic poets, for they have committed more murders, poisonings, rapes, and adulteries, they have done more cruel, impious, and rascally things than the most abominable wretches in the world, and in this respect the Classicists, in spite of that most gentle horror of blood which they exhibit on the production of every new play, have not the least right to accuse the Romanticists. In order to give an idea of the intelligence of the cabal formed against Cyrano, it will be sufficient to relate this trait, which is worthy of a modern cabal:—Some worthy townsmen, dolts of that day, went to a performance of “Agrippina,” perfectly convinced that unless they caused it to fail, the whole social structure would infallibly be destroyed. They allowed all the scandalous passages to pass because they did not understand them, and they looked at each other with their big frog’s-eyes and twisted their hats between their fingers with a rather dismayed look, awaiting the signal to hiss; but when Sejanus, having made up his mind to murder Tiberius, says, “Come, let us strike the host!” the boors began to yell and hiss like asps, and to call aloud, “Ah, the poetaster! the beast! the wicked man! the atheist! the Huguenot! Just hear how he speaks of the Blessed Sacrament! Come, let him be burned without loss of time.”

THE GROTESQUES

In spite of these pious suggestions, Bergerac was not burned alive; the days of Stephen Dolet had gone by. But many have perished at the pile for no better a reason, for just as trifling a motive. Théophile de Viau, as you are aware, was executed in effigy, and spent long years in prison.

Oh, man, the only animal that looks up to heaven, I really do not know how you came not to walk on all-fours !

Cyrano met in Paris a comrade of his who had been a schoolmate with him at the worthy country priest's, and who thereafter became his most intimate friend. He was called Le Bret. He was serving in the regiment of the Guards, in the company commanded by M. de Carbon Castel-Jaloux. He forced (he says so himself) our young debauchee to enter it with the rank of cadet. Cyrano soon brought himself to notice by his boldness and his skill with the sword. Duels at that time were considered the readiest, and indeed the only way of showing one's courage. He drew attention so very much to himself and in so very few days, thanks to the number of encounters which he had and the fashion in which he came out of them, that in this regiment, composed almost exclusively of Gascons, he was thereafter known as "the Demon of Bravery ;" and in spite of the little trust usually placed in the hyperboles of the children of the Garonne, no one, this time, thought the nickname at all exaggerated, and it stuck to him during the rest of his life. He literally counted his days by his combats, and even counted more combats than days, despatching sometimes two or three affairs of the sort in a single morning. It was not only in duels that he gained this reputation for intrepidity, but in more general affairs, of which I shall relate one which appears almost fabulous, which brought him a great deal of honour and gave him a very good position at court and in the town. It reads like one of those old romances of chivalry full of great sword-strokes that cut giants down to the belt. It was by the moat of the gate of Nesle that this battle, worthy of the Cid Campeador, took place. Cyrano was with one of his friends. A body of one hundred men — here one hundred men does not mean many men, but one hundred individuals — struck and insulted him. He drew his sword without being in the least degree terrified by their number, dashed upon them, laid out a couple of them on the spot, wounded seven others so severely that they never recovered, and drove the rest before him like a flock. This encounter won him the more glory that it was his friend and not he who had been insulted; and it must be said in Cyrano's honour that he was ardent and prompt to serve those whom he loved, that he had not very many quarrels on his own account, and that it was rather as a second that he fought than for himself. M. de Bourgogne, colonel of the Prince of Conti's infantry regiment, and several other noblemen no less distinguished as experts in matters of bravery, witnessed this superhuman battle and spoke most highly of it in society. The illustrious Cavois, Brissailles, an ensign in the guards of his Royal Highness, M. de Zedde, M. Duret de Montchenin, one of the bravest of men, who served him and were served by him on some occasions permissible at that time to people of their profession, praised his courage as being equal to that of the most valiant of men.

We have dwelt much upon the audacity and rashness of Cyrano, first, because since the days of Horace, and even earlier, poets have acquired a thoroughly well deserved reputation for cowardice, and we are very glad therefore to find one who is brave and manly in spite of his being a poet; next, because his audacity and rashness did not forsake Cyrano when he laid aside the sword for the pen. The same characteristic of extravagant and witty boldness is met with in all his work; in every sentence he is fighting with reason. Reason in vain stands on guard and holds itself well behind the hilt of its rapier; fantasy has always in reserve some secret thrust with which it pierces her and stretches her out on the sward. In less than a minute, like Capitan Chasteaufort, it has advanced and retreated, surprised the forte of the blade, cut under the arm, marked every beat, used a flanconnade, thrust under; it has lunged in tierce under the sword, in carte over the left foot, feinted inside and outside, cut and slashed, shaken, gained ground, engaged, volted, parried, made the riposte, carted, passed, and killed, not more than thirty men, but more than thirty really new and philosophical ideas. The thrusts our gentleman makes use of are exaggerated metaphors, over-refined comparisons, plays upon words, quibbles, conundrums, conceits, witticisms, low jests, far-fetched preciosity, the quintessence of sentiment, — whatever, in a word, is excessive in the bad taste of Spain, ingenious and flashy in the Italian, cold and mannered in the French. Of course, unhappy reason cannot often have the better of such an adversary; nevertheless it sometimes issues victorious from this unequal duel, and one regrets that it does not oftener have the advantage over its fantastic enemy.

For the rest, Cyrano belongs thoroughly to his age. The mad audacity which marks both his thoughts and his acts was not uncommon at that time. The Matamore, or hectoring bully, a delightful type which has vanished from our comedies, just as the types of the Scapins and the Lisettes are going to vanish, or have vanished as I write, was in reality but a slightly over-drawn portrait. There were plenty of these nose-slitters with turned up moustachioes, shoulders well back, chests well out, cloak thrown over the shoulder, broad-brimmed hat pulled down over the eyes, legs like compasses, armed with a rapier as long as a day of starvation, who fought with those who trod on their shadow, scattered troops of horse by the mere wind of their sword-cut, and sent word to humankind not to dare to be alive three days hence under pain of having to do with them. Listen to the Hector of the stage: —

“Who are the rascals who are making a noise yonder? — If I come down, I will let loose the Fates. Do you not know that in these hours of stillness I order everything to be silent save my renown? Do you not know that my sword is made of one half of the shears of Atropos? Do you not know that when I come in it is by a breach; when I emerge it is from battle? — that when I ascend it is to a throne; when I descend it is to the duelling-ground? — that if I lie down, that means a man laid out; if I go forward, I am conquering; if I draw back, it is to spring forward better; if I play, it is at spoil the king; that if I win, it is a battle; that if I lose, it is my enemies; if I write, it is a challenge; if I read, it is a sentence of death; finally if I speak, it is by the mouth of a gun?"

And now listen to the city Hector: —

"Well, my stout man, I have at last seen you. My eyes have travelled at great length upon you, but as I am not everybody, permit me to hand down your portrait to posterity, which one day will be very glad to know what manner of man you were. First, then, it shall be known that nature, which stuck a head on your chest, expressly refrained from putting a neck to it so as to guarantee it against the evil prognostications of your horoscope; that your soul is so gross that it might well serve as a body to a somewhat slim person; that you have what in men is called the face so very much below the shoulders that you look like Saint Denis carrying his head in his hands. But good heavens! What do I see? You appear to me to be more swelled even than usual. Your legs and your head are already so closely bound by their extension to the circumference of the globe that you are, that you are nothing but a balloon. Perhaps you fancy that I am making fun of you. You are right. I will even assure you that if the blows of a stick could be seen like writing, you could read my letter with your shoulders. Be not astonished at my way of proceeding, for the vast extent of your stoutness makes me incline so much to the belief that you are an earth that I would willingly plant wood upon you to see how it would fare. Think you that because a man cannot thrash the whole of you in twenty-four hours and can compass but one of your shoulder-blades in a single day, I propose to intrust the care of your death to the executioner? Oh, no, I shall myself be your death, and you would be already done for were I only free from an affection of the spleen, for the cure of which the doctors have ordered me to take some four or five pinches more of your impertinence; but as soon as I shall have exhausted diversions and shall be tired of laughing, you may be certain that I shall send you word forbidding you to reckon yourself among living things."

The man who speaks thus is no other than our hero, Savinien Cyrano de Bergerac, who has quite the manners and the style of Captain Fracasse; and the one whom he is thus addressing is Montfleury the actor, of the Hôtel de Bourgogne. Molière, in "The Versailles Impromptu," in the scene where he takes off the actors of the rival troupe, also alludes to the hippopotamus-like size of Montfleury : —

---

"And who is it that plays the parts of kings with you?"

"Here is an actor who occasionally takes them."

"What, that well made young fellow? You are joking. You must have a king stout and fat enough for four people; a king, by Jove! who has a proper size of corporation, a king of vast circumference, who can fill a throne suitably. A pretty object a king of handsome figure would be!"

Let it not be supposed that this is merely a joke. The actor who had thus been warned, having dared to appear on the stage, Cyrano shouted to him, from the centre of the pit, to withdraw, else he might make his will and consider himself dead. Montfleury, who knew very well that he was a man to do just what he said, obeyed at once, and it was only a month later that our swashbuckler allowed him to return to the stage and to continue to bellow with his bull voice the lines ascribed to kings and tyrants.

This prank was no doubt prompted by some dispute which had occurred between the poet and the actor during the rehearsals of "Agrippina ;" perhaps also it was mere caprice.

Cyrano, being at the siege of Mousson, received a musket wound in the body, and later, at the siege of Arras in 1640, a sword-thrust in the throat. He was then twenty. He began early, and many a brave soldier serves all his life without being lucky enough to be as honourably wounded. Nevertheless, the incommmodity caused by these two serious wounds, the frequency of the duels which his reputation brought him, the privations which he had had to endure during these two campaigns, his love of study, his independent spirit, and the little hope he had of promotion — for he had no patron — combined to disgust him with the service. He abandoned wholly the profession of war, which requires a man to give himself up to it completely and leaves him no freedom of mind or action. Marshal Gassion, who liked brave and clever men, had indeed sought to attach him to himself, on the reports which had been made to him of Cyrano's fight at the Nesle gate ; but Cyrano, in spite of the solicitations of his friends, had not accepted these advances, so much did he fear that his gratitude would compromise his liberty. He was naturally a very disinterested man, and besides cared as little as may be for the people of his day, and did not think that the servitude consequent on familiarity with and the patronage of the great was sufficiently compensated for by the favours and advancement which might result therefrom. This temper of his made him neglect some very useful acquaintances, whom the reverend Mother Marguerite, who held him in very special esteem, wished to have him make and cultivate. However, in order to satisfy his friends, he consented to have a patron at court, and chose the Duke of Arpajon, to whom he dedicated his works. This nobleman's protection was not of much use to him; Cyrano, indeed, complains of having been abandoned by him during his illness, and had no reason to be satisfied with him in any way. Nevertheless, he remained with him until the night when, returning from the Duke's mansion, he was struck on the head by a piece of wood thrown down inadvertently. This wound caused his death, which occurred in the country, at the home of his cousin de Cyrano, whose conversation he was very fond of, and to whose house — through a fancy for a change of air which precedes death and which is an almost certain symptom of it with nearly all patients — he was carried five days only before he gave up the ghost. His death happened in 1655. Cyrano was then thirty-five years old. He died like a Christian, having long since given up wine and women, and confined himself to excessively simple food.

CYRANO DE BERGERAC

Cyrano's character was very amiable and bright, and his conversation abounded in witty sallies. He therefore had many close connections and friendships, and was fortunate enough to be beloved by every one up to the day of his death, and even after it by a few. Besides his childhood's friend, Le Bret, he had most pleasant intercourse with many others, all brave, clever, or well-born men, such as de Prade, who was at once a poet, a brave man, and a scholar; M. de Chavagne, who always hastened to meet those whom he desired to oblige with such pleasant impetuosity; the illustrious councillor de Longueville-Gontier, who had every quality that makes a perfect man; de Saint-Gilles, in whom the deed always followed the desire to do service; de Lignière, whose work gives proof of such exquisitely fine inspiration; de Châteaufort, endowed with admirable memory and judgment, and who so happily applied the numberless fine things he knew; des Billettes, who at twenty-three knew everything that others are proud to know at fifty; de la Morlière, whose manners were so fine and who apologised in such charming fashion ; the Count of Brienne, whose wit corresponded so well to his high birth ; and the Abbé of Villeloin, so learned, and producing indefatigably so many good and useful works. This enumeration must also include the famous mathematician Rohaut, who thought highly of Cyrano and bore him much friendship ; Molière, who prized his talents sufficiently to rob him of one of his best scenes ; and Gassendi, who consented to admit him to his lessons, by which he profited. Gassendi, who was the preceptor of Chapelle, had also Molière and Bernier for pupils, lucky teacher that he was !

The right of great geniuses to take their property where they find it has been much discussed recently, and a great deal of nonsense talked about it. It has been said that it is not robbing, but conquering. Ennius's dung-hill has been quoted, the pearls in which belonged by right to any Virgil that was ready to take them. It has been claimed that it was doing much honour to poor Ennius that Virgil should take the trouble to polish, to set, and to flash in the eyes of people the rough gems hidden in Ennius's mud ; that such robbing was really rather creation ; only this condition was insisted upon, that the robbed should also be murdered — which is nice literary morality. All that is very pleasant and convenient for barren brains, and I am not surprised that such a paradox has found defenders; but, whatever versemakers may say, I am fully of Cyrano's opinion, that penalties more rigorous than those decreed against highway robbers should be established for plagiarists, because, glory being more precious than a horse, a coat, or even than gold, those who acquire it through books which they compose out of what they have stolen from others are like thieves who dress themselves at the expense of those whom they have robbed; and if each one had liberty to say only what had not been said, libraries would be less large, less embarrassing and more useful, and man's life, although very short, would be almost sufficient to read and know every good thing, while, as it is, in order to find one passable thing it is necessary to read a hundred thousand that are worthless or that have been read elsewhere many a time, — which is a useless and unpleasant expenditure of time.

THE GROTESQUES

We do not mean to say, however, that a writer should not draw inspiration from the works of the masters in general, or from that one of the masters

with whose talent he has most secret affinity. It would be very much as if it were to be insisted upon that any man who follows an art or a science should have little by little intuitively divined the principles for himself. That would be unreasonable. Every one is entitled to profit by the master's experience, to start from the point which he has reached, to make use of his processes and his way of expressing himself; but to no more than this. To take a figure, a word, a sentence, a page, is just as much stealing as picking a pocket, and to call it by another name implies a very high state of civilisation.

You have doubtless heard that the galley scene in "The Tricks of Scapin" was imitated from Cyrano de Bergerac, but it is not likely that you took the trouble to look it up where it is — in "The Tricked Pedant." Now read what follows, and in spite of all the respect due to the great Molière, tell me if it is not the most barefaced plagiarism possible. Besides, this is not the only plagiarism which Molière is chargeable with. If the old sketches of plays and the Italian writers of tales, such as the "Facetious Nights" of Signor Straparola, for instance, were examined, the master of the French stage would be found to have a very small share of invention; nor would Shakespeare be much better off. A very singular fact, which the investigations of science daily establish more clearly, is that the men whom it has been agreed to call geniuses have, properly speaking, invented nothing, and that all their invention and their ideas are generally found in the works of mediocre, obscure, or wretched authors. What is the cause of the difference, then? Style and character, which after all are the only things that constitute the great artist; for everybody may invent a poetic incident or idea, but very few are capable of carrying it out and expressing it so as to be understood of others. Here is the scene from "The Tricked Pedant": —

Corbinelli (Scapin). Alas! All is lost! Your son is dead.

Granger (Géronte). My son dead? Are you mad?

Corbinelli. No, I am quite serious. Your son, in truth, is not dead, but he has fallen into the hands of the Turks.

Granger. Into the hands of the Turks! Support me, — I expire.

Corbinelli. Scarcely had we entered the boat to cross over from the gate of Nesle to the University quay —

Granger. And what were you going to do at the University, you ass?

CYRANO DE BERGERAC

Corbinelli. My master, remembering the order you gave him to purchase some trifle rare in Venice and not very costly in Paris to present to his uncle, thought that a dozen bundles of wood being cheap, and there being none in Europe as pretty as those made here, he had better take some to Venice. That is why we were going to the University — to buy some. But scarcely had we left the bank behind us, when we were taken by a Turkish galley.

Granger. Yet, by the twisted trumpet of Triton, the marine god, who ever heard it said that Saint-Cloud was on the sea, and that there were galleys, pirates, and reefs there ?

Corbinelli. That is what makes the thing still more remarkable. And although they have not been seen in France save in that one spot, who knows whether they did not come here from Constantinople between two tides ?

Paquier. Yes, indeed, sir, for the Topinambous, who live four or five hundred leagues beyond the earth, once came to Paris, and only the other day the Poles carried off the Princess Mary in broad daylight from Nevers House, without any one daring to oppose them.

Corbinelli. But they were not satisfied with that, — they proposed to stab your son to death —

Paquier. What ! Before he could confess ?

Corbinelli. Unless he gave money for his ransom.

Granger. Ah, the wretches ! That was done to instil fear into his young breast.

THE GROTESQUES

Paquier. That is right. The Turks are very careful not to take Christian money, because it bears a cross.

Corbinelli. My master could find nothing to say but, "Go and find my father and tell him —" His tears, forthwith choking his speech, told me better than he could have done himself of the affection he bears to you.

Granger. But what the devil was he doing in a Turk's galley? A Turk's! Perge!

Corbinelli. These pitiless pirates would not have granted me leave to come and find you, if I had not cast myself at the knees of the one who appeared to be the most important among them. Oh, Mr. Turk, — I said to him, — allow me to go and inform his father, who will straightway send you a ransom.

Granger. You ought not to have spoken of ransom. They must have made fun of you.

Corbinelli. On the contrary, on hearing the word "ransom" he became more peaceful. "Go," he said to me, "but if you are not back shortly, I shall fetch your master out of his college, and I shall hang the whole three of you at our ship's yard-arm." I was so afraid of hearing anything worse, or that the devil should carry me off, because I was in company with these excommunicated people that I promptly sprang into a skiff to come and inform you of the dreadful particulars of this affair.

Granger. What the devil was he doing in a Turk's galley?

CYRANO DE BERGERAC

---

Paquier. And it is some ten years perhaps since he went to confession !

Granger. But do you think he has quite made up his mind to go to Venice ?

Corbinelli. He thinks of nothing else.

Granger. Well, the evil may yet be cured. Paquier, give me the receptacle of the instruments of immorality. Scriptorium scilicet.

Corbinelli. What do you propose to do with them ?

Granger. To write a letter to that Turk.

Corbinelli. To what purpose ?

Granger. To tell them to send me back my son, because I want him. Besides, they must excuse youth, which is subject to many errors ; and if he allows himself to be caught again, I promise them, on the word of a doctor, no longer to weary their ears about him.

Corbinelli. They will laugh at you, by my faith.

Granger. Go and tell them this from me : that I am ready to bind myself before a notary to return without a ransom the very first one of their company who may fall into my hands. The devil ! What the devil was he going to do in that galley ? Or tell them that if they do not send him back, I shall go and complain to the courts. As soon as they have set him at liberty, waste no time in returning, for I need you both.

Corbinelli. All that is sheer nonsense.

Granger. Good heavens ! And am I to be ruined at my age? Go with Paquier. Take what is left of the money which I gave you for expenses only a week ago (to go into a galley without any purpose ! ) ; take the change of that coin. Ah, you wretched son of mine ! you cost me more gold than you weigh. Pay the ransom, and what is left, use it for pious purposes. In a Turk's galley ! Well, that will do. Be off. And here, you wretch, tell me what the devil he was going to do in that galley ! Go, and fetch from my cupboard that worn doublet which my father gave up wearing in the year of the great winter.

Corbinelli. What is the good of all this nonsense ? You must come to the point. His ransom will take at least a hundred pistoles.

Granger. A hundred pistoles ! Ah, my son, would I could give my life to preserve yours ! A hundred pistoles ! Corbinelli, go and tell him to let himself be made a prisoner without a word. But he is not to be downcast, for I shall make them repent it.

Corbinelli. Miss Genevotte was no fool when she refused a while ago to marry you because she was assured that you were quite capable, if she happened to be a slave in Turkey, of leaving her there.

Granger. I shall prove them liars. To go off in a Turk's galley ! By all the devils in hell, what was he going to do in that galley ? Oh, galley, galley ! You have put my purse in the galleys.

Paquier. That is what comes of going to galleys ! Who

CYRANO DE BERGERAC

the devil urged him to do it? If he had had the patience to wait another week, the king might have sent him to the galleys in such good company that the Turks would not have taken him.

Corbinelli. Our dominie forgets that the Turks will eat him up.

Paquier. You are quite safe, as far as that goes. Mohammedans do not eat pig.

Granger. There, be off with you. Take all my worldly goods!

Do you not think that this is abusing very strangely the privilege of a man of genius? And this scene is not the only one which Molière took from Cyrano. That most amusing scene in "The Tricks of Scapin," in which the lively Zerbinette tells G ron te of the stratagem which has been made use of to draw money from him is in full in that same "Tricked Pedant." It is copied even more closely than the other, and every part of it is to be found there, even the endless "ha ha!" and "he he!" of the adventuress. I know not what the Granier-Cassagnacs of that day have said about it. "The Tricked Pedant" is remarkable, among other peculiarities, as being the first comedy written in prose, and the first in which a peasant speaks in his own dialect. It is not the only thing that men of great reputation have borrowed from the obscure Cyrano de Bergerac. His "Trip to the Moon," and his comic "History of the States, Empires of the Sun," suggested to Fontenelle the idea of his "Worlds," to Voltaire that of "Micromégas," to Swift that of "Gulliver," and perhaps to Montgolfier the idea of the balloon. For among other means of reaching the moon or the sun, Cyrano mentions this one, to wit: "to fill a hollow and very thin globe with a very subtle air or smoke of weight less than that of the atmosphere." That suggestion made, there is not much left to be done, and the real inventor of the balloon is, in my opinion, Cyrano de Bergerac, and not any one else. Amid the ingenious paradoxes and the most far-fetched, philosophical ideas, amid the exaggerations of the most frantic and adventurous genius, it is easy to see that Cyrano was acquainted with the exact sciences, and that he knew physics perfectly, and Descartes' system from beginning to end. He had also written a "History of the Spark," in which, in the same fashion that he proved that the moon is inhabitable, he proved that stones feel, that plants are endowed with instinct and brutes with reasoning powers; but a thief ransacked his box while he was ill, and unfortunately that history has never been found. If we are to believe his friend, M. Le Bret, it was superior to all his other works, and he bitterly deplores its loss.

THE GROTESQUES

CYRANO DE BERGERAC

The works of Cyrano consist, first, of a collection of letters on different subjects. These letters are a sort of amplification, in which the quaintness of the style rivals the novelty of the ideas. They are written in the most highly developed euphuistic style, but they are full of brilliancy, and of prodigious fertility of invention. They are his juvenilia and the first performances of his pen. Next, "The Tricked Pedant," a comedy in five acts, in prose; "The Death of Agrippina," a tragedy in a much more serious tone than the rest of his works, written in verse of a vigour equal to Corneille's, and in which there are many passages which approach the sublime irony of "Nicomedes." The following extract may serve as a sample : —

Tiberias. My son's wife conspiring against me !

Livilla. Yes, I, wife to thy son, daughter to thy brother,
Was about to stab thee, my uncle and father.

To unite a hundred crimes in one, I would have the renown
Of committing a deed for which there is no name.

THE GROTESQUES

I, your niece, daughter-in-law, cousin, daughter,
I, bound to you by all family ties,
I wished to profane with the stroke of my vengeance
Every degree of relationship and of connection
To violate in your breast both nature and law,
I alone cause all your relatives to rebel,
And show that a tyrant in his own family
May find an executioner, though he have but a daughter.
I have slain my husband, and would have done worse,
So that I might no longer be wife to your son ;
For I had admitted your son to my couch
Only, through my children, to be mistress of your race,
And all your blood to shed as I pleased
Once it was compelled to pass through my breast.

Finally, "The Trip to the Moon," — the first part of which, wherein are expressed divers conjectures upon what the little night-sun may really be, is in some respects marvellously like the famous "Ballad of the Dot on the I," — and the "Comic History of the Sun."

Although quite young, and notwithstanding his lack of taste, Cyrano by dint of fire, boldness, and wit, had almost found favour with Boileau, who said of him, —

"I prefer Bergerac and his burlesque boldness
To the verses in which Motin labours and is cold."

---

These two verses have done more to make him known than all that he has written himself. Just see what human fortune is, and how difficult it is to be a man of genius! For if a man of genius means an inventor, a man who is original both in matter and expression, no one on earth is so well entitled to the appellation as Cyrano de Bergerac; and yet no one thinks of him save as an ingenious and amusing madman.

GEORGE DE SCUDÉRY

SCUDÉRY is unquestionably a very wretched poet, and an equally wretched prose-writer. He thoroughly deserves the forgetfulness into which he has sunk, and it is difficult to come across a more colossal and indigestible lot of nonsense than his collected works. Only men accustomed to that kind of research can have any idea of the determined courage required to enable one to read such monotonous trash. When I remember that I have read from beginning to end “Alaric, or Rome Conquered,” it makes me shudder. An epic poem in ten cantos, which has at most eleven thousand verses, as says in the preface, and in the most free and easy fashion, that great braggart, George de Scudéry. The one thing that somewhat consoles me for the trouble I have taken is that I am the only man who in this year of our Lord 1843 has read an epic poem through, — and that is no slight satisfaction. However, wear-some as are poets of this sort, I confess that I prefer them to those of our day whom it is the fashion to praise. I prefer a barbarous and ridiculous poem like "Alaric," for instance, which is full of incongruous and amusing inventions, to those wretched translations and paraphrases of Greek and Latin authors which are so awkwardly made and which lack the understanding of antiquity which inspires the verses of that time. Besides, Scudéry is a splendid type of a class of writers now vanished, and it is for this reason that I have taken him up. He is the braggart, the boaster, the Captain Fracasse, the Chasteaufort of the sacred vale, a true laurel chewer, who cuts his pen with his rapier and seems in every sentence to challenge his reader. In this respect he is somewhat related to Cyrano, but there are several essential differences between them. The first, which suffices to open a gulf between them, is that Bergerac was a man of prodigious wit; the second is that scarce a day passed that Bergerac did not go on the ground, and that he carried into action all his rodomontades. In Scudéry there runs through his swashbuckler character a vein of pedantry and ill-breeding which is not found in Cyrano. Scudéry is more shiny about the seams, hungrier, dirtier, more ridiculous, — more a man of letters, in a word, — than the author of the “Trip to the Moon,” and I do not think that Molière stole anything from him.

This literary Hector was born about 1601 at Havre, where his father was king’s lieutenant. He belonged to Apt in Provence, and it was there that he spent his earliest years; there also that he made the acquaintance of young Catherine de Rouyère, whom he fell in love with. The first verses of his which we possess were written for this lady. It is always the way: at the bottom of any poet’s vocation, whether he be a good one or a bad one, there is love for some woman. It is easily understood. The poet, however classical he may be, requires a more accessible and less vaporous muse than one of the nine old maids perched on double-headed Parnassus.

George at first embraced the profession of arms and served in the regiment of French Guards; then, wearying of that business, he began to work for the stage. He made his début with “Lygdamon and Lydias, or the Likeness.” It is a tragi-comedy, neither worse nor better than the tragi-comedies written at that time. At the beginning there is a rather pretty scene, from which we shall make a few extracts. The subject is drawn from Honoré d'Urfé's novel "Astræa," the fashionable novel of the day, from which more plays were then extracted than are now drawn from the tales of M. Michel Masson. Next he produced "The Deceiver Punished" and many other plays up to the number of sixteen between the years 1631 and 1644.

Lygdamon, Sylvia's rejected lover, opens the scene with a monologue, in which he discusses the important question whether he shall end his sad existence by means of a rapier or a sword, whether he shall throw himself from a rock or drown himself; whereupon comes in fair Sylvia, very thoughtful and preoccupied.

Lygdamon. This time I have caught you dreaming.

Sylvia. The enamel of the flowers alone entertained me.
I was dreaming like those whose minds are blank.

Lygdamon. Your complexion, which I worship, is of finer roses,

And your mind works only upon great things.

Sylvia. It is true ; I admire the height of these trees.

Lygdamon. Admire my love, greater a thousand times.

Sylvia. How agreeable is the shade of this dark forest !

Lygdamon. That is where your coldness is preserved, by the shade.

Sylvia. I have never seen anything so fair as the skies.

Lygdamon. What ! does your mirror not reflect your eyes ?

Sylvia. How charming is the sound of this purling brook !

Lygdamon. Can you behold it without thinking of my tears ?

Sylvia. Cooling zephyrs I seek within these meads.

Lygdamon. You owe that pleasure to the breath of my sighs.

Sylvia. How numberless the herbs and blooms that diaper these swards !

Lygdamon. Their number is less than that of my pains.

Sylvia. Carnations and lilies blend together here.

Lygdamon. Ay, on your face, but on my own marigolds.

Sylvia. How many different roads pierce the surrounding woods !

Lygdamon. There are as many crosses to my love.

Sylvia. That little butterfly never leaves me.

Lygdamon. So does my heart accompany your steps.

Sylvia. How sweet to my ears is the song of the birds !

What tones and harmonies ! List to the marvel !

Lygdamon. Alas, fair Sylvia ! a god makes them sing

From whom you fly so you may not content me.

Sylvia. I beg you, Lygdamon, make me to know him.

Lygdamon. So you know not what you give birth to ?

Sylvia. I am chaste, and no child have borne as yet.

Lygdamon. Yes, you have.

Sylvia. Name him.

Lygdamon. By all called Love.

For a man who was but now about to kill himself, this is surely lively and witty enough. No doubt the wit is somewhat far-fetched, but the motive of the scene is quite poetic. The lover who holds to his one idea, spite of all the indifferent things which his mistress talks of to prevent his speaking of his love for her, and who succeeds in fitting to his design the very expressions which are to draw him away from it, — such a lover is an ingenious find.

If we are to believe the author, this tragi-comedy was most successful. “Lygdamon, which I wrote on leaving the Guards, and in my first youth, met with a success which surpassed both my hopes and its merits. It was performed thrice running before the whole court at Fontainebleau, and whether that illustrious society excused a soldier’s mistakes, or accounted these mistakes pleasant sins, this much is certain, that the points touched a hundred illustrious hearts, and that having praised highly a thing which was little worthy of it,” etc. Our Hector continues at some length in this fashion and praises all his plays, one after another, with the most admirable effrontery. “We now come at last,” he says, “to that blessed disguised prince who so long delighted and charmed the whole court. Never did a work of this sort create so great a sensation, and never did a violent work last so long. The men all went to see the play wherever it was performed, the women all knew its stanzas by heart, and there are yet to be met with many of the best people who maintain that I have never done anything finer, so greatly did this sham enchanter enchant everybody."

Every one of his plays has its own particular merit: one has drawn tears over and over again, not only from the eyes of the common people, but from the fairest eyes in the world; another would have been no less successful if the actor who played the leading part had not died; a third did not succeed very well, but when published it attained the popularity which had been counted on for it on the stage; a fourth suffered somewhat from the mischance of antagonistic constellations; however diverting it was and however fine the subject, it was but faintly praised; on the other hand, "Love the Tyrant," which came immediately afterwards, fully compensated for this slight check, for the whole court and with it the whole of France spoke in such eulogious fashion of this work that George de Scudéry, modest and shy writer that he is, dares not reproduce what was said, so laudatory and glorious was it. "As for the great 'Arminius,' it is my masterpiece that I offer you in this play, the most highly praised work that ever came from my pen; for whether we consider the story, the manners, the sentiments, or the versification, it is certain that I have never done anything greater, more beautiful, or more exact; and if my labours could have deserved a crown, it is upon this last work only that I would found my claim. Therefore it is with this poem that I close the series of my writings of this kind, and henceforth you shall have no more such from me unless the sovereign power compels me. It is time that I should rest, and that having reached the end of the career of which I spoke in the beginning of this discourse, I should look at those who pursue it after me, that I should applaud them to excite them to glory, and show them the recompense which awaits them."

At the beginning of "The Deceiver Punished" appears the portrait of the great man, with this somewhat presumptuous inscription:

"Both poet and warrior, Laurels shall he wear."

Which caused some who did not admire him or his verse, to say:—

"Both as poet and Gascon, Shall he be beaten."

GEORGE DE SCUDÉRY

His arms appear below. They bear a lion ascendant, on a field argent probably, for the field of the shield has no hatching. The portrait shows a long, thin, dark face, quite Spanish in character and closely resembling all the heads of that time, — curling hair, waxed and curled moustaches, beard cut to a point, eyes rather large, with heavy eyebrows, aquiline and humped nose: you know the kind of face. The poet wears over a steel gorget a great cravat of Venice lace with long vandykes, open-worked and heavily embroidered. His doublet is covered with points, and on the whole he wears a rather stylish dress, half foppish, half military. What seems strange is that, prefixed to this same play there is found, among eulogious verses in all languages, a madrigal by Corneille which, I fancy, is not widely known: —

“Thy Cleontes by his death
Holds out an attractive fate
To trickery.
In view of the wondrous fame
Which thy pen bestows on him after death,
Gladly would one deceive to be thus punished;
And though it cost him his life,
Men will always envious feel
Of the luck which followed his evil fate,
Since he would no longer live had he not thus died.”

THE GROTESQUES

Scudéry having published anonymously his reflections on "The Cid," Corneille, who was far from being as modest and patient as it has pleased some writers to represent him, addressed a very sharp letter to him, and launched against him a rondeau in the Marotic style which is as good as the madrigal and which is its palinode : —

" Let him do better, that youthful youth,
Whom the Cid so greatly troubles,
Than to heap insult upon insult,
A dull imposture to angrily rime,
And like a criminal himself conceal.
Every one knows his jealous temper,
Points him out as a serious fool,
And puts no faith in his fine style.
Let him do better.

" All Paris, his challenge reading,
Sends him to the devil and his muse to —
For me, I pity the pains he suffers,
And as a friend beseech him and pray,
If an immortal work he wishes to damn, —
To do better.

" Omnibus invideas, livide, nemo tibi."

Scudéry wrote this criticism of his, addressed to the illustrious Academy, in order to pay his court to the Cardinal Duke, who regretfully witnessed the brilliant success of the "Cid," which eclipsed that of his own play, and could not bear that Corneille, who had at first been one of the five authors working under his own orders, should seem to emancipate himself; — at least, so it was said. For my part, without affirming that this had nothing to do with the matter, I think Scudéry may very well have written the criticism to please himself, and that he sincerely believed the play a wretched one. Nor is this surprising. For to what extremes will not prejudice lead a man? Every day cleverer people than Scudéry think the finest things in the world pitiful, and demonstrate, with apparent logic, that they are worthless as a matter of fact. The way to do this, though not new, is none the less infallible, and very simple. For instance, you say: “To compose a good tragedy such and such things are required. It must be moral in conception and there must flow from it a grave, austere lesson for mankind; it must contain terror and pity — φόβος καὶ ἔλεος — this being the foundation of every tragedy; this and that must be in it, for we see in the Stagirite or elsewhere that it cannot be otherwise. Any one can see plainly that there is nothing of all that in the work which we are reviewing; that the rules have not been observed; that the manners and costumes are inaccurate, the sentiments exaggerated; that probability is constantly violated, and that the public is evidently in the wrong when it crowds in to see it, and when it takes such pleasure in it."

Scudéry's criticism of "The Cid" would seem most just and natural to any one that knew French and had not read "The Cid," if such a person existed. He begins first, like every critic who knows his business, by kindly informing you that the piece is utterly damnable, that it is a moral enormity, a monstrosity, that it is parricidal and incestuous, that it violates all human decency and respect. He explains all this at great length, and alleges reasons which are certainly no worse than many others which have been considered sound. Next, when he has fully established the fact that the piece is immoral, infamous, and worthy of being burned by the executioner, he demonstrates that it is absurd, impossible, and carried out in spite of common-sense; he brings out the poverty and puerility of the means employed, the unlikelihood of the entrances and exits, and all this with very close dialectics which it is difficult not to yield to. Then he exhibits the falseness and exaggeration of the characters. He shows you that the Count of Gormas is nothing but a comedy bully and a mountain-swallower, Rodriguez a popinjay, Ximena a dissolute woman and an adventuress who does not know what good form is, Don Arias a stiff lover, Isabella a useless personage, and the king a downright fool. Having proved this, he has now only to strike the last blow, a secret thrust, more difficult to parry than all the others. Not only is the work immoral, absurd, improbable, it is copied, from one end to the other. You believe that much belauded "Cid" to be Corneille's work? Well, not at all, it is the work of Guillen de Castro, and as Claveret elegantly remarks, "Corneille had merely to choose in that beautiful nosegay of Spanish jessamine in bloom, which was brought into his very room. And even then, how did he imitate, in what kind of verses has he set these beautiful starry flowers which bloom in the garden of Guillen de Castro? In verses which often lack the rest after the hemistich, and which are crowded with faults of grammar and with barbarisms." And to prove his assertion he quotes more than two hundred passages translated, copied or imitated.

Two or three hundred passages copied!

I hope that is conclusive enough. Nowadays no author could recover from such an attack; and truly, without being of Scudéry's opinion, one cannot help conceding, great as is the respect which one has for the bronze statue of old Corneille, that the chief merit of "The Cid" is not in the invention of the subject or of the details, but in the elevation of thought, in the vigorous, solid, indestructible form of the style and the verse.

The most amusing thing is the final slap, in which Scudéry gravely reproaches M. de Corneille, recently ennobled, with being truly and ignorantly swollen with pride; with being more puffed up and more stilted than the Castilians of his tragedy; with believing himself the first poet in the world because of some slight praise he has received; and with being disdainful of more illustrious people than himself. He tells him that he ought to consider it an honour to be a simple citizen in the republic of letters, that he ought not to attempt to become its tyrant.

The latter accusation appears not to lack justification. Corneille, it seems, had taken for a motto this line of "The Cid,"

"To myself alone I owe my renown."

This terribly shocked Scudéry, who seems to have believed himself very modest. For the matter of that, modesty is scarcely the failing of the writers of that day; they are more swollen with pride than the frog that was envious of the ox. Spanish wind distends their skin until they are near bursting. Spanish hyperbole has invaded everything, the novel, tragedy, comedy (which was the drama of that day), songs, couplets, music, dancing, and fashion. It is the same proud poverty, the same beggar's vanity, the same wealth of gaudy rags. It is the real time of mud-bespattered and would-be heroic poets, of highly refined poetry dull as ditchwater. All the epigraphs, all the mottoes are Spanish; everything is imitated or translated from the Spanish; festivals, cards, masquerades, tilts are in the Spanish taste. People make love in Spanish fashion; gallantry is characterised by the amazing puerility which marks amorous commerce beyond the Pyrenees. It is a succession of escalades and duels. Lovers who do not know how to swim jump into the water booted and spurred in the hope of softening the heart of their love, or cause themselves to be brought to her apartments in a box at the risk of stifling in it. Every madrigal is a fabulous exaggeration, and it is hard to believe that such things could ever have been said. Every sonnet is a casket which contains more pearls,

GEORGE DE SCUDÉRY

The sun figures continually, dragged in about the very first eye that comes along, called one-eyed and blind ; and it is robbed of the rank and title of grand-duke of the candles, which Dubartas had so graciously given to it in favour of some Phyllis in a house of ill-fame or some ancient Philaminta. It was a great time. Types abounded on all hands. Every figure stands out clearly against the background of the age ; every one of the characters casts on the wall, as it passes, a sharp, clearly defined silhouette. There is the scholar, the pedant, the Sidias, half cad, half valet, with dirty hands and dirty face ; a black, patched cassock full of holes, spattered with mud, gaping at every seam, spotted with wine dregs, glazed and shining with grease ; woollen stockings climbing spirally around the place where the calves ought to be, unfastened breeches, and a vermin-infested wig ; a sort of animal stuck full of Greek and Latin like a porcupine, constantly chewing and mumbling some threadbare quotation, his pockets always full of books and papers ; a drunkard, smelly, miserly, obstinate ; a low libertine who addresses hendecasyllabic verses in the manner of Catullus to the Mollies and Kates of his tavern ; for the rest, very learned, versed in all the languages of the world, capable of saying “ Bring me drink ” in fifty-two different tongues. Then the poet — there is a nice figure ! Look at him walking with proud mien, heroically ploughing through the mud with his soleless boots. He is starving, and yet he passes in front of the cook-shops with the most indifferent air. Accost him, and this is what he will tell you : “ Oh, how I gorged myself this morning ! We were five or six veteran eaters, and we stuffed ourselves as full as we could hold. Among other things there was a wild boar’s ear and a saddle of young ass, washed down with a light Arbois wine which was not half bad and which makes me lick my lips at the mere thought of it.” Then if you follow the poet who has had such a good breakfast, you will see him, after he has turned into a solitary lane, munch, under cover of his mantle, a bit of hard bread and a piece of stale cheese which he has stolen from a mouse-trap. His breeches are made of a thesis printed on satin, and his rapier was formerly a spit. His poverty does not prevent his believing himself a really spoiled child of the Muses, the beloved son of Apollo, the favourite of kings and of beauties, nor his gravely promising to immortalise all those who will be good enough to let him dine with their kitchen scullion and sleep in a dog-kennel or in the stable. Nor is the braggart less entertaining, with his chest well thrown out as in Callot's grotesques, one foot planted forward, one hand on his hip, head thrown back, his absurdly long rapier adorned with a no less absurdly large shell, his extravagant and huge plume, his titanic moustache which pierces the heavens with its two sharp points; and when, following Scudéry's example, he mingles literary pretensions with every one of his boasts, you laugh until you nearly split your sides. Just listen to him! With what a superior and grandiose air he cavalierly treats poetry: "I am but a soldier, I understand better how to arrange battalions than periods, and I have used more arquebus matches than candle-wicks; I can handle the sword better than the pen, and it is rather on the battle-field than on this meadow of white paper that my valour should be judged of. This little work, which the reader cannot fail to consider admirable, — for the most honourable people in the world have considered it to be so, — I wrote by way of satisfying my fancy and passing the time, and not to derive any profit from it, so that I give to the players what I might have sold to them, —” and no end of other vain boasts. And then the noble swashbuckler, using false dice, coining counterfeit money; and the Italian adventuresses with their velvet masks, perfumed, rouged, of such elegant, bold figure, having always amid their pots of pomade, their scent bottles, some little flagons of delicate poison and a powder with which to prepare the boccone; and the good, pot-bellied citizens, cautious and testy, ever ready to throw up barricades. How harmonious, yet different, are all these types, and what a picture full of variety and ensemble they compose!

Scudéry, in spite of his scant talents and his brag, was none the less well thought of by the great cardinal, and Sarrazin, in a “Discourse on Tragedy” prefixed to “Love the Tyrant,” does not hesitate to say that the play is one of the finest and most admirable, and that it is safe from the attacks of the envious, both because of its own intrinsic merit and because of a protection which it would be more than sacrilege to violate, since it is that of Armand du Plessis, the tutelary god of letters. Through Madame de Rambouillet, with whom his sister, Magdalen de Scudéry, was very intimate,

George de Scudéry obtained the post of governor of Our Lady of the Guard in Provence. It is a sort of barrack perched on the summit of a hill, which caused Madame de Rambouillet, who knew thoroughly the character of her friend, to say laughingly that he was very well placed, and that this devil of a man would never, on any account, have accepted a governorship in a valley; consequently he would be admirably situated there, perched upon a rock which overlooked the whole country and with his head in the clouds. This post was probably given him about 1641 or 1642. Chapelle and Bachaumont, speaking of the castle of Our Lady of the Guard in most comical fashion, say it was in every respect a nest fit for such a bird:—

“ Every one knows that Marseilles
Is rich, illustrious, nonpareil
For its situation and its port.
But if we are to tell you of a fort
Which no doubt a marvel is,
It is Our Lady of the Guard;
A commodious and fine command
Which needs no further guard
Than a Swiss with his halberd armed,
Painted upon the castle gate.
. . . Gentlemen, there
It is long since any one entered.
The governor of that rock,

Posting off to return to court,
Did some fifteen years ago
In his pocket carry off the key."

It would seem, nevertheless, that the governorship did not bring in much revenue, if we may judge by the lines which Scudéry, being ill, sent to the Cardinal Duke whom he had recently accompanied into Piedmont.

"But notwithstanding the illustrious favour
Which makes my lot illustrious and great,
But for you this my important place
Shall soon become of my tomb the site.

"Yes, upon this distant rock,
If your hand does not succour me,
I shall resemble Prometheus,
Whom a vulture, 't is said, did devour.

"Hunger, that terrible vulture
Which is so much to be feared,
With its beak so pitiless
Shall come and persecute me there.

"Great Duke, from me this danger now remove!
Care for a soldier who served you well;
And by a miracle in our day renewed
Upon this desert make the manna fall."

Scudéry had spent a great deal of money in installing himself there, and transporting to the spot numberless cases containing the portraits of all the poets, from

Jean Marot, father of Clement, down to Colletet; for Scudéry, who was a pretty thoughtless person, wasted the small means he possessed in trifles of this sort, and administered his property very ill in spite of his sister's efforts to inspire him with the spirit of thrift and economy. Undoubtedly he was not rich enough to form a gallery of paintings, if we are to believe Legros, who relates that having come a long distance to visit a certain Mlle. de Palaiseau, formerly courted by Paul Scarron, he dined off a piece of bread in one of the walks of the Luxembourg, unable apparently to pay for a meal elsewhere. The lines we have just quoted support this statement; yet if Scudéry was short of money, it was probably due to his carelessness rather than to actual poverty, for his books—though discredited since his day and poor though they certainly were—sold uncommonly well, and he wrote many. Boileau himself acknowledged this, with that tone of sulkiness and bitterness usual to him:—

Fortunate Scudéry, whose fertile pen
Can each month easily a volume write.
Your writings, it is true, lacking art and dull,
Seem to be composed in spite of common-sense;
But yet they find, in spite of what men say,
A tradesman to sell and fools to read them.

GEORGE DE SCUDÉRY

Balzac, although he praised the tragedy of "Arminius," was not, it seems to me, a very great admirer of our poet, or of the learned Saumaize with whom he couples him: "Oh, fortunate writers! You, M. de Saumaize, in Latin, and you, M. de Scudéry, in French, can write more note-books than I can write almanacs. Fortunate are the writers who make use of memory and their fingers only in their work."

If Balzac means that de Saumaize and de Scudéry were wrong to produce a large quantity of very poor stuff, his reproach is very well founded; but his phrase is turned in such fashion that it might be believed it is facility of production which he ridicules. One of the first gifts of genius is abundance, fruitfulness; all great geniuses have produced enormously, and it has never been meritorious to take a very long time to do a very little thing, whatever may say both Malherbe and Balzac and all the slow writers whose brain is choked with the soot of the midnight oil, and who suffer from the difficulty of expressing their thoughts.

Scudéry had also his admirers, Claveret, Chaudenville, Mairet, Chapelain, Conrart, and other wits of the day, for he is not absolutely devoid of merit, as might be thought at first glance. He possessed invention, facility (which he always indulges in to excess, it is true), and here and there one comes upon bright and witty traits. As a descriptive poet he is often worthy of praise. The underlying idea in one of his volumes of verse, entitled "The Cabinet," is really very ingenious. He supposes a gallery formed of all the objects of art, pictures or statues which he has seen in Italy or elsewhere during his travels, or else which he owns himself, and he writes about each picture a few verses in which the story of the subject is interwoven with the description. He dwells at great length upon the portrait of Duke Armand de Richelieu by Philippe de Champagne (this portrait is now in the gallery of the Palais-Royal),<sup>1</sup> and on that of Master Adam, the Nevers joiner, and author of "The Pegs." This latter portrait is by Chauvau. He also speaks at great length of Callot's work. He wrote still another volume of miscellaneous poems, among which are some rather well turned, besides an enormous number of sonnets, several of which have for their subject the Fountain of Vaucluse and the loves of Laura and Petrarch, and I know not how many poems and harangues; "The Faithful Caloander," a chivalrous romance translated from the Italian, which I read some six or seven years ago in the house of a village priest, and of which I remember the title only ; and the novel of “Polixandre,” a continuation of “Astræa.” This shows that he was a prolific author. Péliſson calculates that he wrote from eleven to twelve thousand verses, — a calculation evidently much below the truth, since his works contain sixteen plays, all of them in verse, with the exception of “A Comedy of the Comedians,” and each one at least fifteen hundred lines long. “Alaric” alone contains eleven thousand lines ; so Boileau could truly say that he brought forth without difficulty a volume a month.

THE GROTESQUES

“The Illustrious Bassa” and “Cyrus the Great” appeared under the name of George de Scudéry, “Governor of Our Lady of the Guard, and a Captain on the strength of His Majesty’s Galleys,” as he never failed to state. In these two books the prefaces and dedications alone are by him, and the only work he did was to read the proofs. Eventually, however, he had got to believe that it was he who had written his sister’s novels, and he would rage most fearfully when the contrary was maintained ; hence some amusing quarrels.

Having been obliged to withdraw to Granville in Normandy, in consequence of some slight intrigue in behalf of the Prince of Condé, he met, at the house of Madame de l'Épinay-Miron, Miss Mary Frances de Moncel de Martin-Wast, who fell deeply in love with him and whom he married. He had by her a very handsome and very witty boy, who later entered the church. Madame de Scudéry, left a widow at thirty-six, did not marry again, but lived in Paris, where she died at the age of eighty-one in 1712. Scudéry himself died also in Paris on May 14, 1667. He had been elected a member of the Academy in succession to the purist Vaugelas, the translator of Quintus Curtius.

Apart from his many absurdities, he had some good points: in friendship he was faithful and perfectly trustworthy; he wrote the apology of Hardy, his master in the dramatic art; he edited very kindly the works of several of his friends, among others Elzéar de Sarcilly, Sire of Chaudeville, who died at the age of twenty-two; he was the only one who did not forsake Théophile de Viau in his misfortunes; he maintained that de Viau was the greatest poet in the world and the rarest wit that ever lived, and he ended by saying that whoever doubted that had better learn that he was called de Scudéry. He also built de Viau a tomb in verse, which is to be seen at the beginning of his works and in which he praises him in the most intrepid fashion at a time when Théophile's dearest friends pretended not to be aware that he had ever lived. Chevreau relates in his "Ana" a trait which does him the greatest honour. Here is the passage : —

"Queen Christina told me once that she was reserving, in return for his forthcoming dedication to her of his poem 'Alaric,' a gold chain worth a thousand pistoles; but when the Count of Lagardie, who is very highly spoken of in that poem, fell into disgrace with the queen, she desired that the Count's name should be struck out of the work. When I informed him of this, he replied that the chain might be as big and as heavy as that of the Incas, but he would not destroy the altar on which he had offered up sacrifice. This heroic pride displeased the queen, who changed her mind; and the Count of Lagardie, obliged to acknowledge Scudéry's generosity, did not even thank him for it."

Scudéry was unlucky in everything. Madame d'Aiguillon had obtained for him a priory worth 4000 livres

a year; at the end of six months the prior, who had been believed dead, but had only been taken prisoner by the enemy, reappeared, and Scudéry had to give up the property. At the very moment when he was finishing "Alaric," the Queen of Sweden, in whose honour he had undertaken to write it, abdicated piteously.

Since we have done with the rather wearisome biographical details which have just been read, let us speak at somewhat greater length of "Alaric, or Rome Conquered," a heroic poem dedicated to Her Most Serene Highness the Queen of Sweden by M. de Scudéry, Governor of Our Lady of the Guard. The work is adorned with copper-plate engravings, and opens with a frontispiece on which is seen Alaric, sceptre in hand, with a plumed helmet, in the centre of an architectural design surmounted by a shield bearing the arms of Sweden supported by two crowned lions. Below are prisoners, their hands tied behind their backs, recalling statues of the great king. Next comes a very interesting dedicatory epistle. In it the author professes the most extreme admiration for Queen Christina. Among other things he says: "I protest, Madam, that I venerate Your Majesty no less than if I had been born on the shores of the Baltic Sea, and I question whether Your Majesty would meet among the Goths with as much admiration and respect as I bear towards her in my heart. Indeed, those who have tried to make us accept pyramids, tombs, and colossi as wonders of the world, have tacitly told us that they had no Christinas in their time, for they would not have wasted their time describing them as prodigies of art, had they possessed so great a miracle of nature to tell us about." That is most gallantly turned and most admirably reasoned out. A little farther on he adds: "I must confess that the North has now its Minerva in Stockholm, as formerly it had its Diana in Tauris; that wit and virtue belong to no particular climate, and that they are found as well in Stockholm and Upsala as in Rome and Athens. Since the death of the great Cardinal Richelieu, my master, I have given very little praise to any one because I have seen very little to praise; but one cannot be silent about a royal hand which often deigns to lay down the sceptre in order to take up our books, and which brings back that happy time when, we are told, philosophers reigned and kings were philosophers. . . . I know that it does not belong to a grinder of paints to dare undertake to paint you, but if my power has equalled my zeal, a fair Amazonian Queen shall perhaps have her Apelles as Alexander had his, and the glory of Thomyris and Amalazontha, your forerunners, will be wholly eclipsed by the incomparable brilliancy of Your Majesty's fame. . . . It is not enough for me that one should be called Porphyrogenetes, and unless the royal sceptre of kings is matched by royal virtues, I esteem it as little as I do a shepherd's crook."

It would appear that this rather curious word, porphyrogenetes, was a particular favourite with Scudéry, for when he composed the compliment he had to speak at his reception, he sent to Conrart, secretary of the Academy, these three lines to be added in a place which he indicated: "The Academy may, more justly than the emperors of the East, call itself porphyrogenetes, since it was born in the purple of cardinals, of kings, and of chancellors." A sublime and splendid idea indeed, which was well worthy an insert.

Let us return to the dedicatory epistle. "To behold so extraordinary a thing I would go not only as far as Thule, where Virgil sets the ultimate bounds of the world, but I would go, if necessary, beyond the new world discovered since his time. One must know in order to love, it is said, and yet I love without knowing, — if the inequality of conditions permits the use of this word and if respect suffers it; but why should it not suffer us to love kings, who are but the image of God, since God himself not only suffers us to love Him, not only commands it, but puts that command first and foremost of all? So, when I learned that Your Majesty had fallen into the sea, I felt my heart beat at the dreadful news, and in the midst of the very peril in which Your Majesty was I should have been less pale than I then became. If this terrible adventure happened in the way it was related to me, the chisel, the brush and the colours would have fallen from my hands; the triumphal arch which I have erected in your honour would have remained unfinished, and it would have been seen only as the illustrious ruins of Rome, in which by the beauty of a few broken columns one judges of the grandeur of the whole building.”

This may give the reader an idea of the modesty of our friend and of the prefatory style. It would appear further that the queens of the North had the unenviable monopoly of the dedication of epic poems: Saint-Amant’s “Moses” is dedicated to the Queen of Poland.

After the dedicatory epistle comes a portrait of Queen Christina with this quatrain below:—

“Laws Christina may impose
Upon the bravest conqueror;
But does the earth a ruler hold
Who is worthy her slave to be?”

Then comes the inevitable dissertation upon the excellence and super-excellence of the epic poem above and beyond all others; on the manner of preparing and dishing it up; on the question whether the inspiration should be sought in fable or history; on the question whether or not mythology may be introduced into it; and on many other fine problems, the poet showing, as is the custom, that he is perfectly well acquainted with all the proportions and alignments taught by art and that he has consulted the masters thereof, that is: Aristotle and Horace, and after them Macrobius, Scaliger, Tasso, Castelvetro, Piccolomini, Vida, Vossius, Pacius, Riccoboni, Robortel, Paul Benni, Mamburnus, and several others; that he has read and re-read most carefully Homer's "Iliad" and "Odyssey," Virgil's "Æneid," Lucan's "Pharsalia," Statius' "Thebaid," Boiardo's and Ariosto's "Orlando in Love," and "Orlando Furious," the famous Torquato's incomparable "Jerusalem," and a great number of other epic poems in divers tongues, such as the first books of Ronsard's "Franciad," Father Lemoine's "Saint Louis," the fine poem of "The Conquest of Granada," the best work that Italy has given us since Tasso's time: and finally he proves that poetry was not invented, as Castelvetro roundly maintains, per diletta re è ricreare gli animi della rozza moltitudine è del commune popolo, but to delight gods and kings.

In the same dissertation he justifies himself on the highest authority for having made his Alaric in love with the beautiful Amalazontha. Hugo has said:

"Chaste love doth ennoble souls,
And who true love knows, knows how to die."

Scudéry is also of the opinion that there is no heroism without love; honest love is, properly speaking, the fire of Hercules, which, burning him up, made him a god; and as Guevarre, one of the finest wits of Spain, has very elegantly said, "Arde y no quema; alumbra y no dana; quema y no consume; resplandece y no lastima; purifica y no abrasa, y aun caliente y no congela." These are the best reasons in the world, and they cannot be denied. He also states that his "Alaric" is in ten books simply because he chose to have that number ; besides, the “ Iliad ” and the “ Odyssey ” contain twenty-four, the “ Æneid ” twelve, the “ Punica ” of Silius Italicus seventeen, Ariosto’s “ Orlando ” forty-six, Boiardo’s sixty-eight, “ Jerusalem Delivered ” twenty, and Marini’s “ Adonis ” twenty also, which proves that there is no absolute rule and that every one may do as he pleases. Heaven be praised, — and George de Scudéry ! for in truth I fail to see why he did not write sixty-eight cantos, as did Boiardo.

Next we come to the Privilege, which it would be a mistake to skip, for it is the most entertaining part of the book. It is written by Conrart, and Scudéry, having read it, sent it back to him, complaining that that was not the kind of Privilege he wrote for his friends, and he had better retouch it ; which Conrart did most complaisantly. Here are the passages : . . .
“ Our dear and well beloved Sire de Scudéry, Governor of Our Lady of the Guard in Provence and a Captain on the strength of Our galleys, has caused Us to be informed that he has written a heroic poem entitled ‘ Alaric, or Rome Conquered,’ which he intends to adorn with figures engraved and drawn by the best masters of the day, in order to render it worthier of his intended dedication of it to the Most Serene Queen of Sweden, Our very dear and well beloved cousin and ally, who by her striking virtues and her royal liberality attracts the admiration and the good will of men of wit and learning in all parts of Europe; but considering that this cannot be done save at great expense, both for the printing as well as for the figures, he has most humbly beseeched Us to grant him Our letters necessary to prevent his work being pirated in this realm, and exposed for sale if it is pirated elsewhere. Wherefore, having in mind to treat favourably the petitioner, who — after having signalised himself by divers brave and valorous deeds during more than a score of years spent in the army during the reign of the late King Our most honoured Lord and Father, both by land and sea, in France and in foreign countries, in which he has held honourable commands and posts — has for some time past withdrawn from this hard profession, and in a quieter walk of life has shown by a great number of beautiful products of his mind that he was born as much for letters as for arms, We have granted to him, etc., etc. Done by the King in His Council. praises of so official a character bestowed upon one, to be declared a great man notwithstanding opposition, injunction, and reservations, and all this sealed with a seal of yellow wax upon parchment! What can be more respectable or more capable of imposing silence upon malignant critics? Modern prospectuses are poor things in comparison, even when drawn up by good Charles Nodier, the man of our time who praises with the most shameless guilelessness and candour. I place the praise in that Privilege far above the Spanish, Italian, Latin, or Greek sonnets, the Hebrew or Syriac madrigals, the learned procession of which winds pompously along the first pages of every new work, and I am sorry, in truth, that Privileges are no longer prefixed to books, for I should infallibly have made use of that literary subterfuge in my next epic poem.

The subject of the poem itself is very simple. An angel suggests to Alaric the idea of overthrowing Rome, the crimes of which have at last wearied the patience of the Almighty. Alaric joyfully accepts this high commission; but the fair Amalazontha, who is the object of his love, cannot bear his going, and does her utmost to keep him back. She fails to do so, and calls to the help of her charms a necromancer called Rigilde, who fills with phantoms the forest in which trees are being cut for the building of vessels, and drives crazy a white bear which devours the workmen. The killing of this bear is a mere pastime for Alaric, who is very valiant and very skilful. At last the fleet sets sail. The wizard Rigilde puts the sailors to sleep and carries off Alaric, also asleep, into an enchanted island where he shows him a sham Amalazontha. The prelate of Upsala with difficulty breaks the spell, and carries away the Gothic prince in spite of his opposition. Assassins, which are but shadows, appear to stab with many blows Amalazontha, herself a shadow. It is a devilish illusion, due to Rigilde, which soon vanishes. Herein lies the dualism, the conflict in the poem: Rigilde draws Alaric one way, the prelate of Upsala draws him the other; for there is a myth in this aforementioned poem neither more nor less than in a novel of Madame Sand's. Alaric is man's soul; the spell under which he falls, like Ulysses in Calypso's isle, is symbolical of man's weakness, even the strongest men, who, deprived of the help of divine grace, fall into strange errors, but, thanks to its powerful help, succeed in rising again and then getting rid of the errors themselves. The magician who persecutes him represents the obstacles which the demons always throw in the way of good intentions. The beautiful Amalazontha is the powerful temptation of voluptuousness; the great number of enemies who oppose him are the world, which is one of the three that the Christian soul has to fight, according to the Sacred Scriptures and the Fathers. The invincible defence of the hero is free will; the endless tricks of the demons are the incessant warfare they wage against the soul. The attacking of Rome and the Prince's triumph are the victory of reason over the world, the flesh, and the devil, and the immortal crowns which God bestows upon virtue.

All the same the poem, looked at as a poem, is uncommonly wearisome. In colour and details it is occasionally interesting. It represents much more faithfully the times in which it was composed than any of the works which are superior to it. One can plainly perceive Louis XIV and his court through all these Gothic princes and Scandinavian lords. They all wear full-bottomed wigs, gold or silver cloth cuirasses, and kilts. Their costume is very like that seen in the " Battles of Alexander," — warriors covered with scales, red on one side and yellow on the other, baldrics heavily braided, fluttering draperies of changing colours, aigrettes, and extravagantly tall plumes; chins up, toes turned out, as if the warriors were about to dance a minuet; massive carved and gilded cars drawn by big horses, satin white, with enormous rumps, and tails properly trussed up; great trees with long leaves deeply indented and of the crudest green; boats with richly emblazoned prows worked by half-naked men the colour of pumpkins, who academically show off all the muscles of their brawny arms; landscapes in which yellow and ultramarine prevail; seas green as leeks; palaces with huge terraces and stair-cases; walks lined with orange trees in apple-green boxes; round ponds, cascades falling in sheets, jets of water, and all the waterworks of the Gardens of Versailles. You find all that in Alaric; drawing, costume, colour, architecture, landscape,—the times are accurately reflected, even in the least details. One would swear, for instance, that this was sketched and coloured by Lebrun or Parrocel; it is the portrait of a female warrior:—

“ Her wavy hair, with great golden curls
Carelessly falling, makes her fairer yet.

THE GROTESQUES

Her brow 's adorned with a tall ermine cap
Whose wondrous whiteness her good looks becomes ;
A heron's plume of darkest black
Makes whiter yet the ermine white.
A loose dress she wears of skin of tiger made,
Which, though savage looking, most tasteful is ;
By a buckle caught up it lets the eye perceive
Her buskins lined with a vulture's skin.
Of grass is her quiver, of whalebone her bow ;
Her scarf of reeds down to the ground extends,
Her sword supporting, and its verdure fair
Mingles with the spotted white that covers her form
The whiteness of her arms, to the ermine opposed,
A new lustre wins that makes it fairer still,
And her brilliant complexion, spite of its rosy blush,
Would make a swan show black by its side.
Her features all are exquisite, her figure superb,
She walks with a gait worthy of a goddess,
And in her mien, superb as its appears,
Is fear-inspiring yet attractive pride."

There is a charming costume for you, well fitted for a ballet. It is quite in the semi-antique, semi-romantic mode of the day ; nothing could harmonise better with the boxwood hedges and the curly-wigged Tritons of the basins. Here now is the description of a fountain : —

" In the middle of the court a fountain rare
Throws high in air its ever-welling wave,
And these ascending jets splash down again

GEORGE DE SCUDÉRY

---

Upon the marble white their waters lave.
Of many marine monsters the figures quaint
On this transparent frame has sculpture placed ;
And this broad basin, opening like a vase,
Rests on a jasper pillar, red and green.
In the basin's midst is a Nereid
Trying to dry her still wet hair,
And who, seeming to press her long and wondrous locks,
Makes foam and water ever from them spring.
The tritons twelve which the machine upbear
Are seen to gaze upon this water nymph,
And through their shells hurl high in air
A thousand streams of crystal pure."

These Tritons are cousins german to those of Versailles; they must all have been cast by the brothers Augier or the Kellers; the nymph is probably by Coysevox or Girardon. The style is exactly the same, and it is impossible to tell whether the poet writes after seeing the work of the sculptor, or whether the sculptor has carried out in marble or in bronze the imaginary description of the poet.

Boileau's line is well known, —

"A surfeit of festoons, a wealth of astragals ;"

but, please Boileau, there is a great deal of dash and imagination in the description of the enchanted palace. Its architecture is of marvellous richness. There are columns rising above columns, domes of prodigious height, endless galleries, golden trellises, jets of water springing heavenward, great marble staircases, pot-bellied balusters correct in style and handsome, rustic and non-rustic cabinets, vases, and statues, bowers cut in a thousand fashions, groups of statues,—a fairy Versailles, which neither Levau nor Hardouin Mansart nor Le Nôtre would have disavowed. This façade seems to be worthy of any architect. Neither Bramante nor Bernini could be more fecund or richer.

“ But the great building’s royal front,
Effacing all the rest, unequalled is.
The eye is charmed, the mind amazed,
The hand itself trembles as it describes.
Throughout the Corinthian order reigns,
The fair acanthus leaf curls everywhere,
And mid these ornaments are ever seen
Triumphal helms and smoking vases high.
Festoons in every part and crowns at every point,
Bases and capitals, columns, pilasters,
Masks and cupids, ciphers interlaced,
And skulls of rams that are strung on cords.
On moulding and cornice the glance e’er rests,
On figures of bronze in niches rich,
Friezes, balconies, outworks, and scrolls and shields,
And fruit-filled cornucopias with golden leaves and blooms.
All, in a word, that architecture can achieve,
Or fine art of drawing and sculpture rare,

GEORGE DE SCUDÉRY

All shines brilliantly on this palace front,
Which never had its like and never shall."

The staircase is not unworthy of the façade: —

“ . . . The stair
Shows its length, superb and singular ;
Carved in white, pure marble, a hundred nymphs are ranged —
Great baskets of flowers on their heads upborne, —
Heads adorned by art and nature both —
And seem to seek to the rich apartments to ascend ;
Their left maintains the splendid basket ; firm upholds
The right the rich folds of their antique dress ;
And art has transformed, by its noble effort,
The veins of the marble into those of their form.”

Comes now the bathroom : —

“ Octagonal in shape it looks to the dawn.
Four steps of marble deeply sunk,
Are fitted to sit on by the silver wave
Which into the jasper bath abundant flows.
Swift pours the water from the crystal urn
Held under right arm by metal river god,
Which amid the reeds and iris wet
Seems to rest his brow with wrinkles seamed,
While with one hand he seeks to dry
The long, wet hair that surely troubles him,
And at the same time to dry the bristling beard
That drips under the hand that presses it.
In every angle a column stands, and there besides are seen
The linen and the perfumes in golden vases four
That carving rare in low relief adorns.

Four marble nymphs in four recesses placed

I confess that this palace, though solemnly anathematised by Boileau, pleases me greatly, and that I would very well like to walk with some La Vallière or Amalazontha under —

"The thick and covert shade Cast by the green architecture of the grove, —" and the more peacefully that, as simple Scudéry artlessly remarks, —

"The precepts of art are carefully observed."

Talking of the precepts of art, I have forgotten, and it is one of his greatest titles to classic glory, that Scudéry was the first to introduce the rule of twenty-four hours into his "Liberal Love," the result unquestionably of a fine imagination, and which ought to have earned for him the indulgence of the Regent of Parnassus. Unfortunately, Scudéry did not always stick to classical regularity. He has written a comedy full of fantastic freedom, a sort of a play turned inside out, in which the scenery is reversed and which shows you the back of the actor, the spectator being, as it were, placed at the back of the stage. This curious production is entitled "The Comedy of the Comedians."

Among the numerous historical or imaginary personages, pitiful or comical, who strut about the great stage of the world and who are subject to be transformed into dramatic heroes, without their leave being asked, by the caprice of the first pedant that happens along, there is one class of people whose profession seems to protect them against such a misfortune. It scarcely occurs to one to think of an undertaker being buried, or of a hangman being hanged; and for the same reason it seems strange that a player should put himself on the stage, he who is in the habit of putting others on it; and yet there is something piquant in seeing an actor, a man who expresses only thoughts which are not his, who lives on the love and passion which are portioned out to him, who does not breathe a sigh which has not been marked down for him, who does not make a gesture which is not artificial, — it is piquant, I say, to see such a man express, for once, his own ideas, his own every-day thoughts, and talk a little of his household affairs, of his kitchen, of his loves, of his wife and his legitimate children; he who has made

THE GROTESQUES

so many declarations of love to beautiful princesses under the shade of paper trees, and who has so pitifully dirtied his only pair of silk breeches by dragging himself on his knees across carpets of painted canvas. It is fun to see beaten by his own wife this thorough-paced libertine, who has contracted so many secret marriages and who almost every evening at the end of the play is obliged to acknowledge — thanks to a gold bracelet made of copper and adorned with sapphires of blue glass — some charming little bastard girl who was carried away quite young and taken off to Algiers by Moorish corsairs. But the poor comedian possesses himself so little, he is so fatally a prey to imitation, that he cannot even be himself when he is himself; he must play always and incessantly. He cannot wipe off that powder and rouge which destroy his natural complexion, which sink into his skin; Scapin's tunic clings as close to his body as did the robe of Dejanira to the body of Hercules; and if he does drink a bottle of wine — not one of those bottles turned in wood, from which he pours imaginary bumpers into a bottomless goblet, but a genuine, joyous bottle, full of good, real wine — he cannot carelessly throw away the cork as any one else would do; he has to pick it up and put it in his pocket, for he will use it to blacken his eyebrows when next he plays the part of a tyrant or a traitor. What a life is his ! His own face is not his own, his smiles and his tears do not belong to him, he is obliged to conceal his lilies under plaster, his roses under rouge ; according to the requirements of the part, he must exchange his beautiful black hair for a wig of tow. His real name is the only name by which he is never called. The fancy of an author may compel him to use on his visage a decoction of that very licorice intended to cure the cold which he took last winter when playing the part of a Roman, bare-armed and bare-legged, with the thermometer at ten below zero. Unquestionably, next to being the lover of a woman who has moustaches, the worst of all human conditions is that of a player, or a dramatic artist, as it is now called. And yet, O Public, you brute beast, men resign themselves to that martyrdom for the sake of being bombarded with rotten apples by you ! Such a life leaves a good deal for the imagination and can furnish an excellent basis for a comedy, though M. Casimir Delavigne did write a poor one on this subject, which nevertheless in its day enjoyed some reputation.

THE GROTESQUES

Another poet, Gougenot of Dijon, a fellow-countryman of mustard, also wrote a "Comedy of Comedians." The Dijon man's play has the same title as that by the Governor of Our Lady of the Guard, and I cannot quite reconcile this fact with Scudéry's claim that his comedy is a poem of a new invention, in the style called capriccioso by the Italians. Gougenot's play is of 1603 and Scudéry's is of 1605, which establishes a strong presumption in favour of the former; nevertheless the latter's play is the brighter and the more fantastically developed, and we merely mention the other to recall it.

The Count of Vigny condescended to tell us that his "Chatterton" cost him seventeen nights of work; Scudéry begins by informing us that if his play succeeds as well in book form as on the stage, he will not regret the fortnight which it took him to write it. A fortnight is less pretentious than seventeen nights, but not so bad considering the times.

Here comes Prologue. The famous Mondory plays the part. He is indignant at the absurd things which they are trying to make him believe. His comrades must be crazy. They tell him that he is not on the stage, that this is the city of Lyons; that yonder is an inn and here a tennis court, where comedians who are not themselves and yet who are themselves, are representing a pastoral. How the devil can any one believe such nonsense? They pretend that he, for his part, is a certain M. de Blandimare, although his real name is Mondory; and his companions have all taken assumed names, Belleombre, Beauséjour, Beausoleil, as if the public did not know them and did not know that they are the comedians of the Hôtel de Bourgogne, and not a provincial troupe. For his part, he will have nothing to do with it and begs the public to excuse this fantasy and to keep quiet. These gentlemen, being of a very melancholy disposition, are exceedingly fond of silence.

The scene represents the entrance to the play-house; two posters, as huge as the posters of a modern benefit performance, are affixed on either side of the door. Belleombre, the janitor of the company, wearing a Spanish sombrero, fiercely curled moustaches, a tuft in the shape of an artichoke leaf, his shoes covered with extravagant rosettes, a cloak capriciously twisted around his body, his left hand resting upon the hilt of a colossal sword which must have been worn by Goliath the giant and which resembles the symbolical sword which the painters place in the hand of Saint

Paul, one foot stuck out, and proudly posed, awaits in a stoical and solemn attitude the kind public which is in no hurry to come. If things do not mend, he will be compelled, in spite of himself, to give the lie to the proverb, "A playhouse porter is a thief;" for however expert one may be in the use of pincers and hook, there are no fingers crooked enough to extract anything out of emptiness and to cut the purse of nothingness. The company's treasury is as empty as the drum; there is not a single doubloon, not a red cent, not even a bad penny. Yet, it is past five o'clock; the play has not begun, and it should be ended; the drummer, accompanied by Harlequin, his faithful Achates, has just finished his turn through the town. Harlequin is quite bewildered. It is the first time he has gone through the streets without being noticed. He has not attracted any more attention than if he were a citizen, or if all the citizens had been Harlequins; even the little boys are like so many Greek sages in jackets, and have thought no more of his jokes than if they were Socrates. That tail of street boys which from times immemorial has instinctively glued itself to the back of every drummer, remains occupied in playing at hop-sotch and chuck-hole.

GEORGE DE SCUDÉRY

It is impossible to stir these worthy provincials, sunk in a marmot's torpor. The drumming of the drum, and the sangodemi of Harlequin have been as ineffective as the lies of the poster. The company runs great risk this evening of being deprived of its necessary nourishment and of having to go to bed without having swallowed anything else than the fog and the damp wind.

At last appears an honest, kindly-faced man who saunters by the wall with an air of idlesse that promises well. He looks like a heavy father or an uncle. He is an uncle, looking for his rascal of a nephew, an occupation worthy of such a relative. He looks up, reads the poster, and asks the price of the seats. "Eight pence," replies Belleombre, who is none else than the nephew of the aforesaid uncle, and who, after having tried all the kinds of life to which debauch can reduce a young man, has enrolled himself in a company of strolling players. "Ah!" exclaims the nephew, "it is that devil of an uncle of mine. I am lost, lost!" The uncle scolds him, like the regular uncle that he is. His nephew advises him to go in at once and to reserve his seat; if he finds no one in the house, it is because all the spectators have gone into the tennis court next door and are waiting until the play begins, to come in together. The uncle is not to be fooled; and like every comedy uncle, although apparently a scold and ill-tempered, he is at bottom kind-hearted. He invites his nephew and the whole company to come and sup with him at the Pine Cone Hotel where he is lodging.

The supper is done, the finger-bowls have been passed round. M. de Blandimare, the uncle, who is quite a gallant, offers his hand to the ladies to pass into the room, and affects maliciously to mistake their names when speaking to them. His error is quite excusable, for the names of comedians are so much alike that it is very difficult not to mistake one for the other: Bellerosse, Belleville, Beauchâteau, Belleruche, Beaulieu, Beaupré, Bellefleur, Bellespine, Beauséjour, Belleombre, Beausoleil. In a word, they alone possess all the belles and beauties of nature. In spite of it all, M. de Blandimare is at bottom a friend of plays and players; but he is an exacting amateur, and is of opinion that actors must be like poetry, melons, and wine, — that is excellent; otherwise they are detestable, and he draws an ideal portrait of the player which seems rather difficult to realise: —

GEORGE DE SCUDÉRY

“To deserve the title of good player so many qualities are required that they are rarely met with together. First, nature must do its share by giving the man good looks, for that is what first impresses the mind of the spectators. He must have a fine carriage; free, unconstrained gestures; a clear, distinct, and strong voice. His speech must be free from mispronunciations and from the corrupt accent which one acquires in the provinces; he must speak in pure French. He must have a ready mind and a clear judgment in order to understand verses well, and a good memory to learn them quickly and remember them later and always; he must not be ignorant either of history or of philosophy, else he will make a botch of it, however much he may try, and will often recite things in a way to destroy the sense and as thoroughly wrongly as a musician who lacks ear; his gestures even would then be like those of an indifferent dancer who skips along, always missing the cadence; hence so many extravagant postures, so many unseasonable salutes with the hat such as are seen on the stage. Finally, all his repartees must also be matched or accompanied by a modest boldness which, bordering neither upon effrontery nor timidity, shall be maintained within just proportions; and, to conclude, tears, laughter, love, hatred, indifference, contempt, jealousy, anger, ambition, — in a word, all the passions, — must be depicted on his face whenever he chooses to exhibit them. Now you may judge whether a man of this sort is any less rare than a phoenix.”

THE GROTESQUES

The poor strolling players humbly confess to their host that they are very far from possessing all these qualities, but though they do not own them all, neither do they lack them all; and if M. de Blandimare will be good enough to listen to them, he will see that they are not so very despicable.

“What plays have you?” asks M. de Blandimare.

“All those of the late Hardy, Théophile’s ‘Pyramus,’ ‘Sylvia,’ ‘Chryseides,’ ‘Sylvanira,’ ‘The Follies of Cardenio,’ ‘The Faithless Confidante,’ ‘Phyllis of Scyre,’ the ‘Pastorals’ of M. Racan, ‘Lygdamon,’ ‘The Deceiver Punished,’ ‘Melita,’ ‘Clitander,’ ‘The Widow,’ ‘The Ring of Forgetfulness,’ and all that the finest wits of the time have written. For the time being, a Pastoral Eclogue by the author of ‘The Deceiver Punished’ will, it is thought, suffice.”

M. de Blandimare willingly agrees to this proposal, for he is a great friend of that gentleman who, in his opinion, of all those who wear the sword is the one who best handles the pen. The eclogue is recited. M. de Blandimare, delighted, proposes to give up his own room and his bed to the ladies of the company, and, far from blaming his nephew, enrolls himself in the troupe and takes a part in the tragi-comedy which is to be performed on the morrow and which bears the title of "Love Hidden by Love." The company parts, and the stage represents the stage; it is the third act and at the same time the first. Like "Hamlet, Prince of Denmark," this play contains another play. The first one was in prose, an extraordinary thing in that happy time when dramatic poems were all rimed; the second one is in verse. "Gentlemen," says Prologue. — "Ladies," says Argument. — "That ancient Greek philosopher was right" — "Taraminte, the shepherd of Forez" — "who said that men" — "had only one son called Florintor." "Who is this hempfield scarecrow that comes to interrupt me?" — "And who is that personage dressed up in second-hand clothes who accosts me with such ill grace?" — "I am Prologue." — "And I am Argument." Argument and Prologue dispute with each other, and each proves the other useless. Prologue orders Argument to go and hide himself in the crowd, and tells him that he is only fit to dirty himself with printer's ink and to dress up in paper and parchment. Argument calls him old utility, echo, parrot, and the pair withdraw without any conclusion being reached, just as they had come: "Good-bye, Mr. Argument." "Good-bye, Mr. Prologue."

The scene changes again, and represents a pastoral country. We are in Forez, right in the country of Honoré d'Urfé, on the sweet banks of the Lignon, that well-bred river whose waters are whey. It is a lovely country, and I greatly miss it, for my part. The foliage of the trees is of apple-green silk chenille, the grass is of enamel and the flowers of china porcelain. From amid the well-combed bushes great roses as big as cabbages smile pleasantly upon you with their purple lips, and let you read their innocent thoughts within the depths of their scarlet hearts. Clouds of well-combed cotton wool float softly upon the blue taffeta of the sky. Little brooks, formed by lovers' tears, meander with elegiac murmurings upon a bed of gold dust; young zephyrs gently wave their wings like fans and spread through the air a delightful coolness. The echoes are the most ingenious and the very best bred in the world; they are always ready to reply with some delightful assonance to the stanzas addressed to them, and they never fail to reply, to the lover who asks them whether his mistress feels for him in the torments which he has to endure, sure — for in this fairyland the natural rime to mistress is tigress. Charming little lambs, curled and powdered, with a pink ribbon and a silver bell around their necks, leap in cadence and dance a minuet to the sound of the pipes and tabors. The shepherds wear high-heeled shoes adorned with prodigious rosettes, heavily braided kilts, and ribbons all over their persons. The shepherdesses spread upon the sward satin skirts adorned with knots and wreaths. As for the wolves, they discreetly keep out of the way, and their black noses scarcely ever show from the wings save to afford Celadon an opportunity of saving the divine Astræa. This happy country is situated between the realm of Tendre and the country of Cocaigne, and long since the road that leads to it has been forgotten. It is a pity. I should very much like to have gone to see it; Rousseau long wanted to; but it seems that the real Forez is a most prosaic district with iron-works, where a locksmith easily finds occupation. O imagination of the poets! How cruel are the deceptions you prepare for us!

For the rest, these shepherds resemble in no wise the shepherds of Theocritus and Virgil. It is no longer Phyllis or Amaryllis or Thestilis who are crushing garlic for the harvesters, not even the Chloe of Longus's romance, or Theano, or any of these ladies. It is an entirely different cycle, that one of which d'Urfé's book is the central point; it is a Spanish, a Romantic period. It is an entirely different shepherd population; the names have other roots and are not composed in the same way. Daphnis is called Florintor; Menalcus, Taraminte; Tityrus, Alphause, or Lisimant; the Galatea who takes refuge behind the willows is changed into Isomène or Luciane. The antique simplicity of the antique eclogue would seem rather tasteless to these refined people. Their conversations are regular symposia, full of points in which the most refined preciosity sends out right and left its tendrils and its strange flowers whose perfume intoxicates, — preciosity, that fair French flower, which bloomed so beautifully in the pattern flower-beds of the gardens of the old school, and which Molière so wickedly trampled under foot in I forget what immortal bad little play.

The plot of the pastoral introduced into “The Comedy of Comedians” is rather pretty. Pirandre adores Melisée, who, in order to test the depth of his passion, feigns to receive favourably another shepherd named Florintor. On his part Pirandre, in order to awaken the jealousy of Melisée and pique her self-love, pays attentions to fair Isomène, who receives him very pleasantly; apparently, at least, for she does it only to conceal her game, and her true lover is that same Florintor, the fictitious lover of Melisée, whom Isomène's parents do not approve of. The scenes and situations which result from such an imbroglio can easily be imagined. The comedy parents make up their minds that their children shall be happy and married without further delay; Pirandre shall wed Isomène, Florintor Melisée. The poor lovers, who are caught in the very trap which they have set and in the very lime of their own cleverness, do not welcome this news with much enthusiasm. As in those days the idea of duty was all-powerful and the father excessively feared, the lovers dare not inform their respective parents of the deceit which they have practised, and they agree to meet on the banks of the Lignon for a last interview, after which they will celebrate their wedding in its cold watery bed by drowning themselves. Happily the parents, who suspect something, have followed them, and concealing themselves behind one of those leafy and propitious trees which are never lacking in a comedy, they have heard the whole of the conversation. Touched by so much love, they issue from their retreat and unite the four lovers in their natural order, that is, Pirandre with Melisée, Florintor with Isomène. They had many children. The author does not say so, but I take it for granted.

***

M. de Blandimare speaks to the public a sort of compliment in prose, which introduces the final couplet, and the piece ends. I fancy the description of an actress's dressing-room in 1635 will be read with pleasure. It is complete in itself, and can readily be detached from the rest. It is Beausoleil who speaks : —

“ As our rooms are so far like temples that they are open to everybody, for one well-bred person who visits us we have to endure the impertinences of very many ill-bred men. One will come and swing his legs for the whole afternoon upon a box without saying a word, simply to show us that he has got moustaches and knows how to curl them. Another, somewhat less of a dreamer, but no cleverer, will talk of nothing but trifles of as little value as his own wit ; taking upon himself to be helpful, he will put a patch upon our bosom with the intention of feeling it, or will insist on holding the mirror, tying a knot of ribbon, or powdering our hair, and availing himself of the opportunity to speak of these things, he speaks of them with the stalest and flattest of witticisms. A third, pitching his voice too high and too loud for his prattle, heedlessly censures the poems which we have performed, — one wearies by its length ; the action of another is weak ; a third is dull and sterile of thoughts ; another, on the contrary, suffering from a plethora of ideas, is involved and incomprehensible ; one is defective in that it does not conform to the rules of the ancients and thus exhibits the author's ignorance ; another writer has mastered them too carefully, is cold and fails to impart action to his play ; another speaks disconnectedly and incorrectly, and lacks the polish of the court ; others again lack the ornaments of poetry ; others abound over-much in fables and smack more of the pedant than of the well-bred man, more of oil than of ambergris, — in a word, not one escapes the tongue of that critic, who thinks censuring so many wits without hearing them in their own defence proves that he is as poor a judge of verse as are poor judges of the virtue of women those men who suspect us of having none."

PAUL SCARRON

IN classical times, when writers endeavour to recover through study the severe and simple lines of the ancient poets, they often fall into regrettable excess, into dulness and dryness; they seem to be haunted by a wrong idea of what is a lofty style; the familiar frightens them, they write in a dialect as learned as that of the Brahmins. Good taste is a fine thing, but it must not be carried too far. Through excess of good taste very many subjects, details, images, and expressions which have all the flavour of life are lost. The beautiful rich tongue of the sixteenth century, picked over and winnowed by over-particular hands, seems to us to have lost, along with the few weeds which were removed from it, many ears full of golden grain. We are of those who regret that Malherbe came. A great and admirable poet, Mathurin Régnier, expressed somewhat the same thought in verse of surprising energy and vigour. The influence of Louis XIV was not always beneficial to the literature and art of his time. The great king's periwig has too much part in them, majestic conventions and etiquette have rather driven out nature. The trees at Versailles are curled like the courtiers; the poems are laid out in straight lines, like the walks. Everywhere cold regularity has taken the place of the delightful variety of real life, and the will of a single man has been substituted for individual fancy. Louis XIV, who kindly allowed himself to be personified as the sun, loved splendour rather than art. He was not endowed with the quick intelligence of Julius II or Leo X. He knew that every great reign ought to possess a certain number of poets, prose writers, artists, architects, sculptors, and painters, and he procured the artists whom his glory required; for great kings make great artists, they have only to will; a pleasant look, a kind word, a handful of gold, are sufficient. That improvised art, however, revolved around Louis XIV alone, and aimed solely to please him. To please the king, to divert the king, to praise the king, to paint the king's portrait, to carve the king's statues, — such was the sole, the one and only thought; and as the king was rather fond of somewhat stiff pomp, of somewhat affected solemnity, his taste set the fashion. Poetry always wore a court dress, and had a page to bear its train lest it should drop any of its gold brocade petticoats as it ascended the marble stairs of Versailles. An expression disallowed at court was shunned everywhere else. The d'Hoziers of grammar examined the title-deeds of each word, and such of them as happened to be of middle-class origin were pitilessly rejected. Painting, devoting itself to the production of show-pieces and the decoration of ceilings with mythological scenes, considered that the imitation of nature was beneath its dignity, for Nature had not been presented at court, Louis XIV having in everything, but especially in art, a horror of truth. The Flemish artists were most distasteful to him; he preferred Charles Lebrun, his chief painter, — a piece of royal taste which we must not dispute or discuss.

Out of all this was evolved a magnificent, grandiose, solemn art, but, — let us venture to say it, — save two or three glorious exceptions, a rather wearisome art, which produces an impression not unlike that made by the gardens of Le Nôtre or of La Quintinie; everywhere marbles and bronzes, Neptunes and Tritons

and nymphs, rockeries and basins, grottoes and colonnades, yew-trees in the shape of sugar loaves, box-wood in the shape of boats; whatever can be imagined most noble, most rich, most costly, and most impossible: but after you have walked for an hour or two, you feel a weariness settling down upon you like a fine rain, with the spray of the fountains; a dull melancholy invades your mind at the sight of those trees not one branch of which is higher than another, and whose irreproachable alignment would delight a Prussian landwehr drill-master. You begin, in spite of yourself, to wish you could come across some little bit of rustic landscape, — a clump of nut-trees by a peasant's hut, with its mossy roof covered with wall-flower in bloom; a peasant woman, a child in her arms, standing on the threshold of the door around which twines a wreath of vine; a washing-place at the brook-side down in the valley, under the bluish shade of the willows, enlivened by the chatter of the washerwomen and the sound of their bats; a rich meadow where graze, breast-high in waving grass, great red cows such as Paul Potter paints so well, and which, in courtly idylls, graze, under the euphonic name of heifers, on a sward of green satin. Under the preceding reign the Gallic element was much more visible in literature through the mixture of Spanish and Italian. The Hellenic branch which Ronsard had grafted upon the old trunk of our idiom, nourished by the sap from the ground, had become one with the tree; there is not such a great difference as might be thought between the political discourses of the gentleman of Vendôme and certain tirades of Pierre Corneille. The language was charming; full of colour, simple, strong, heroic, fantastic, elegant, grotesque, lending itself to every fancy of the writer, and as well fitted to express the haughty Castilian manners of the Cid as to chalk upon the walls of pothouses spicy refrains of gluttony. The French mind, clever, malicious, sensible, accurate, but rather lacking in reverie, has always had a secret inclination to the grotesque; there is no nation which more quickly seizes upon the ridiculous side of things, and in the most serious it still finds an opportunity for a joke.

---

In the reign of Louis XIV there still prevailed in literature an adventurous taste, an audacity, a comic spirit, a cavalier style which were quite in harmony with the manners of the refined people of the time.

---

Neither words nor things were very closely examined, provided the touch was firm, the colour bold, and the drawing correct. The influence of Marini, Lalli, Caporali, Quevedo had given rise to innumerable burlesque compositions in which the quaintness of the subject-matter vies with the fancifulness of the expression. A big book could be made merely out of the titles of all the works which the reaction, at the head of which were Boileau and Racine, condemned to deep oblivion, from which they are drawn from time to time by the curiosity of a bibliophile or of a critic who hunts among what are called the minor poets for those characteristic features which talents of the first rank are apt to neglect or disdain. Paul Scarron is in some sort the Homer of this comic school; he sums up and incarnates it; he possessed even the outward physical appearance of his particular style. Byron, the head of the Satanic school, was club-footed, like the devil; Scarron, the chief of the burlesque school, was hunchbacked and deformed, like Punch. The eccentricity in his verse is reflected in the eccentricities of his backbone and his limbs. Ideas, like goldsmith's hammers, hammer out the external shape and force it into hollows and protuber-

PAUL SCARRON

ances as they choose. The name of Scarron is about the only one which has survived out of that whole company, and from time to time some of his plays are still read. Not that among the works of his fellows, hopelessly overwhelmed in the black waters of oblivion, one does not come upon passages as free in movement, as brightly comic and as skilfully written; but human memory, already overburdened with so many names, usually chooses one for each literary form and passes it on from age to age without further examination. An amusing occupation for any one having leisure enough and not afraid of traversing and sometimes going counter to the torrent of generally accepted belief, would be to revise the judgments passed upon a multitude of authors and artists by their contemporaries or by posterity, the latter not being always as equitable as is said. Most certainly more than one of these judgments would be reversed. Such a work, supported by documentary proof, would bring to light innumerable charming things in writers who have been condemned to reprobation and ridicule, and reveal at least as great a number of stupidities and platitudes in the works of writers who are everywhere quoted and lauded. All the grotesque poets have not been fortunate enough, so far as their reputation was concerned, to leave a widow who was to become the wife of a King of France, and this strange stroke of luck has done a great deal to prevent the name of the author of "Don Japhet of Armenia" from being forgotten.

Scarron was born in Paris in 1610 or 1611. He belonged to an old family of good position which came from Moncallier in Piedmont, where is to be seen in the collegiate church a chapel founded about the beginning of the thirteenth century by Louis Scarron, who rests there under a tomb of white marble emblazoned with his arms. His father was Paul Scarron, a councillor in the High Court of Parliament, who enjoyed a fortune of 25,000 livres a year, — a very considerable sum for those times. It would now be worth more than double. There was a Pierre Scarron who was Bishop of Grenoble, and a Jean Scarron who was lord of Vaujour. There is nothing in all this suggestive of a poet and a buffoon; and, without fear of passing for a false prophet, an agreeable future might well have been predicted for the little Scarron and his two sisters, Anne and Françoise; yet that future, apparently so bright and plain, did not keep its promises. Councillor Scarron lost his wife, and heedless of the kindness which heaven had done him by breaking an indissoluble knot, he was fool enough to marry a second time.

Françoise de Plaix bore him three more children, — two daughters, Madeleine and Claude, and a son Nicholas. You are aware that if there is nothing in the world to equal a mother, there is nothing so bad as a step-mother, save a mother-in-law ; so Françoise de Plaix, like the regular step-mother she was, was not very fond of the children of the first marriage, and tried to favour her own with all she could get for them and for herself. Young Scarron, when he was quite a child, noticed these performances and did not hesitate to talk about them. He had no great affection for his family, and was not at all obliged to his father for presenting him with younger brothers who would diminish his inheritance by so much. He was already very free and caustic in speech, and launched at his step-mother stinging remarks which still further embittered the hatred that existed between them. In a word, he managed so well that it became impossible for him to remain in his father's house. The livelong day there was nothing but trouble and quarrels, so that the councillor, a most worthy man but a very weak father, was obliged to sacrifice him for the sake of peace in the household and sent him to a relative at Charlevoix. He remained there a couple of years, and then, exile having softened the ferocious temper of his step-mother, he returned to Paris, where he finished his studies ; after which he took orders — minor orders, although he had no vocation for the Church. His bilious and sanguine temperament fitted him rather for the activity of pleasure than for the tranquillity of meditative life, and he possessed none of the qualities required for the important functions of a priest ; he was therefore satisfied with minor orders, which in no wise bound a man and did not even prevent him from wearing a sword and being an expert duellist, like the Abbé Gondi. The dress of the minor orders was a clean, natty, unprofessional, almost gallant costume, which merely meant that the person who wore it had literary pretensions and was looking for some benefice ; for the rest, no men could be more lay and more free from prejudice than those in minor orders. Wearing their dress and followed by a lackey, they could present themselves anywhere without fear of incurring the wrath of porters. Many a door which would have remained closed, opened of itself to the abbé; and provided he had a bright glance, good teeth, and a clever wit, he was welcomed by great lords and great ladies.

Possessing wit and a bright mind, of honourable family, and having some money from his father, Paul Scarron was bound to be successful in society. He frequented the gallant and witty company of the day; he was welcomed at Marion de Lorme's and Ninon de Lenclos', the two professional beauties of the day, who drew to their houses all the most illustrious and remarkable people, all the greatest names and the cleverest wits of the court and the town. There must have occurred in these great houses of the Place Royale and the Street des Tournelles — for at that time the Marais was the great and fashionable quarter — many a charming talk, many a piquant divagation on all sorts of subjects. The delicate epicureanism of St. Evremond, the sallies of Chapelle, the bacchanal jollity of Bachaumont, introduced into the conversation of the nobles a literary element which sufficed to prevent the commonplaceness of vulgar talk, without, however, falling into preciosity and incomprehensibility, as did the company of the Hôtel de Rambouillet. Scarron could only profit by such intercourse, and there is no doubt that he acquired there that freedom of pleasantry, that happy facility of joking, and that playfulness which, if it is not always in good taste, is at least never forced, and which brings a smile to lips the least inclined to laughter.

In the miscellaneous poems of Scarron are found two short pieces of verse, the one addressed to Marion de Lorme, the other to Ninon de Lenelos, which testify to his very friendly relations with these two famous courtesans. They are interesting in that they show us in what light their contemporaries looked upon these two rivals of Phryne and Aspasia. Here is the handsel addressed to Marion de Lorme:—

“Delight of the eyes and torture of the soul,
Beauty who every day light so many flames,
This little madrigal
For a New Year’s gift is all that I can offer you.
But in return I ask of you,
That instead of giving me one,
Your eyes full of charms
Mine will kindly spare,
So that they may not burn me up
As so many another they have burned.”

The next is addressed to Ninon:—

---

---

PAUL SCARRON

---

“O beauteous and charming Ninon,
Whom never shall one gainsay
Whatever she pleases to order,
So great is the authority
Enjoyed everywhere by the young
Who to wit beauty join :
On this first day of the New Year
I have nothing good enough or fine enough
To make into a gift for you.
With my good wishes be satisfied, —
And a headache then I consent to have
If from my very heart they do not come.
So to you, then, I wish, Ninon,
A not ill-tempered husband, handsome, good ;
Plenty of game, all Lent through,
Good Spanish wine and chestnuts large,
Plenty of money, lacking which every one is sad and dull,
And which all esteem as much as Scarron does.”

To wish that Ninon should have a husband ! rather a funny wish. What would she have done with one ?

Our young poet lived thus until he was twenty-four, giving serious thought to nothing save pleasure, and wrapped up in the charms of numerous intrigues. In those days it was considered proper for every young man in society to make a trip to Italy. Scarron did not fail to follow the fashion. He was in Rome in 1634, and there met Maynard, the poet. The sight of the noble ruins, the solemn melancholy of the city, in which every stone calls up remembrances in which the past overwhelms the present, made no impression whatever on young Scarron; picturesqueness did not affect him. He looked at the city of the Cæsars in the same way as did Saint-Amant, who, however, had to a high degree a feeling for the marvels of art and of nature. He returned from Rome as he had gone to it, and his vocation for the Church does not seem to have been increased by a close view of the Pope, the cardinals, and the monks.

Scarron was not always the victim of gout, the cripple, the hollow-chested and hump-backed paralytic who grimaces on the frontispiece of his works. In an epistle to the reader who has never seen him, he speaks thus of his past and of his present condition:—

“Reader, you who have never seen me, and do not regret it, because there is no great profit in seeing a person shaped as I am, know that I should not care to have you see me, had I not learned that certain officious wits amuse themselves at the expense of wretched me and depict me as being quite different from what I am. Some say that I am a cripple; others that I have no thighs, and that I am placed in a sheath on the table, where I chatter like a blind magpie ; others that my hat is hung from a cord that runs through a pulley, and that I pull it up and down to salute those who pay me visits. I feel conscientiously that I am bound to prevent their lying any longer, and that is why I have caused to be made the engraving placed at the beginning of my book. You will grumble, no doubt, — for every reader grumbles, and I grumble like everybody else when I am the reader, — you will grumble, I say, and you will object to my giving you only a back view of myself. Certainly it is not because I want to turn my back upon the company, but only because my convex back is better fitted to bear an inscription than my concave stomach which is overhung by my drooping head, and because from that side, as well as from the other, the topography, or rather, the irregular plan of my person can be seen. Without claiming to make a present to the public, for I swear by the nine Muses that I have never ventured to hope that my head would be reproduced upon a medal, I would willingly have had my portrait painted if any painter had dared to undertake it. For the lack of a portrait by a painter, I shall tell you pretty much what I am like.

“I am over thirty-eight, as you can see on the back of my chair, and if I live to be forty I shall add a good deal of suffering to what I have already borne for eight or nine years past. I had a good figure, though small; disease has made me shorter by a foot. My head is rather too large for my body; my face is round enough, though my body is thin; I have hair enough not to have to wear a wig, and I have a great many white hairs in spite of the proverb. Although my eyes, which are blue, are large, I enjoy pretty good sight; one of my eyes is more sunken than the other, on the side to which my head falls; my nose is rather well-shaped; my teeth, which were formerly like square pearls, are now the colour of wood, and soon will be slate-coloured; I have lost one and a half on the left side and two and a half on the right, and there are other two which are somewhat chipped. My legs and thighs, at first, made an obtuse angle, then a right angle, then an acute angle; my thighs and my body make another, and as my head falls upon my stomach, I am not unlike the letter Z. My arms as well as my legs have been drawn up, my fingers also;—in a word, I am a crumpled up specimen of human wretchedness. That is just about what I am like. Since I have started on this fine business, I may as well tell you something of my temper; besides, this introduction is written merely to swell out the book by the request of the bookseller, who was afraid that it would not pay for the printing; otherwise it would be very unnecessary,—just as much as many others. But this is not the first time that people have done foolish things out of kindness, besides those which they do for themselves.

“I have always been somewhat hot-headed, somewhat of a gourmand, somewhat lazy. I often call my valet a fool, and a minute later I call him ‘sir.’ I hate no one, — God grant that no one hate me! I am very happy when I have got money, but I should be still happier if I had health. I rather enjoy company; I am pretty well satisfied when I am alone; I bear my ills fairly patiently — But it seems to me that my introduction is rather long, and it is time that I should bring it to a close.”

In a letter to Marigny, he says: “When I think that I enjoyed good health until I was twenty-seven years old, — health enough to have drunk like a German even!” His “Typhon” contains a passage in which the poet speaks of the beginning of his trouble,

THE GROTESQUES

which came upon him at the time of the birth of Louis XIV. This is the passage : —

“ I have been a martyr ever since
From the most adorable body
Of our Queen, whom I love so much,
Came forth Louis XIV,
Louis called the God-given,
For France’s hap well born.”

Louis XIV was born in 1638, so Scarron was about twenty-eight when he lost his health and gained his talent.

It was some time after he returned from Rome that he felt the first of the strange pains from which he suffered without respite to the day of his death. The cause of his illness is not very clear. According to one account, probably apocryphal, Scarron took it into his head during the carnival to disguise himself as a bird. In carrying out this notion, he first of all stripped himself naked and rubbed himself all over with honey ; after which he ripped open a feather-bed, and rolled himself in it so that the down of the feathers stuck to his skin and gave him the appearance of a real bird. Thus feathered he paid several visits to houses where the joke was thought most amusing and in the best of taste. But the heat causing the honey to melt, the feathers began to come off and betrayed the nakedness of Scarron, to the great scandal of the populace, who started to pursue him. Terrified by the shouting, he took to flight and concealed himself in a swamp, where he sank up to his neck. The cold of the water struck home, and he was seized with rheumatism which twisted his limbs and made him impotent and a cripple. Less kindly contemporaries, such as Tallemant des Réaux and Cyrano de Bergerac, attributed this sickness to another cause, to which the somewhat licentious life led by the young abbé lends a good deal of probability. In those days remedies were often worse than the disease; men were sometimes cured of the one, they were not always cured of the others. We may suppose that Scarron was not at first so much of a cripple as he later became. The kindly biographers merely state that a caustic lymph attacked his nerves and reduced him to a state of continuous suffering. So the epitaph which the poor devil composed for himself, and in which one meets with the thought underlying the inscription on the tomb of Trivulcius, Hic quiescit qui numquam quievit, tace, is more truthful than that kind of verse usually is: —

---

“He who now sleeps here
Excited pity more than envy,
And suffered death a thousand times
Before he lost his life.
Make no noise, O passer-by,
Beware of waking him ;
For this is the very first night
That poor Scarron sleep has known.”

The Stoics denied the existence of pain and supported it with constancy, with a determined insensibility with which the pride of their school and the obstinacy imparted by their doctrine had perhaps more to do than real resignation. To suffer and not complain is no doubt a very fine thing, but it takes a great deal more strength of soul to turn one's tortures into jokes, to draw from the subject innumerable buffooneries, and to smile in the presence of very ill luck. To turn one's suffering into derision without seeking to provoke the pity of others, — pity, that “balm of the unhappy” — to play that part for many long years, without the cry of anguish breaking in upon the bursts of laughter, seems to us much more truly philosophical than all the empty declamations of the Sophists. We would like very much to see burlesque verses by Zeno written during an attack of sciatica or rheumatism ; I doubt whether they would be found to contain the least approach to a joke.

The burlesque style, of which Scarron is unquestionably not the inventor, but in which he excelled and which he summed up, as it were, has had both admirers and detractors. The word burlesque in itself is not very ancient, it does not appear much before 1640 or 1650; before that time it had not crossed the Pyrenees. Sarrazin, says Ménage, was the first to make use of it in France, where nevertheless the thing it represents existed, but it was then designated by the term grotesque. The etymology of “grotesque” is grutta, a name given to those rooms of antiquity which have been brought to light by excavations, and the walls of which were covered with animals ending in foliage, winged chimeras, genii issuing from the calyxes of flowers, palaces of strange architecture, and many another caprice and fantasy. “Burlesque” comes from the Italian burla, which means a joke, a piece of fun, and from which are derived burlesco and burlare. Burla, adopted by the Italians, is originally a Castilian word. Burladores is the name given in Spain to jets of water concealed in the grass, which suddenly spring up under foot and soak unsuspecting pedestrians.

THE GROTESQUES

The comedy of Tirso de Molina, which is the model Molière used for his "Don Juan," bears for its title, El Burlador de Sevilla, the word having in its Spanish meaning a more derisive and ironical significance; for he who invites a stone statue to sup with him may be a mocker, but unquestionably he is no buffoon. This style came into general use. Since the days of Panurge especially, and even a good while before, France has been above all others the country of imitation; for the French, who are so bold on the field of battle and in perilous situations, are extremely timid on paper, and our nation, so mad and so frivolous, as observers say, is the one which has always preserved the deepest respect for rules and which has been least venturesome in literature. The moment they take a pen in their hands the French, who are so rash, are filled with hesitation and anxiety; they tremble lest they shall essay something new, not to be found in authors of the fashionable air. So, if an author becomes popular, immediately a multitude of books made after the fashion of his own appear. It would be wrong to attribute this spirit of imitation to the lack of invention or of individual capacity; it is merely a deference to fashion, a fear of appearing to be wanting in taste. France is about the only country where the word original applied to an individual is almost an insult. Every Frenchman who writes is a prey to the fear of ridicule; and that is why, when a style or a literary genre has been adopted by the public, all the authors adopt it, glad to be relieved of the responsibility of having a style of their own. The fact that the success of a work gives rise to a group of works of the same kind is no new thing. Every period has a popular poem or novel of which numerous imitations are produced; and it would be an interesting piece of work to write the history of these kindred families. For this reason our literature is poorer than any other in eccentric works, the general tone being met with in the greater number of contemporary writers, and the particular colour of every period being due to a particular success. Scarron's success let loose a perfect flood of burlesque poetry, or rather of verses which claimed to be burlesque. Subjects least fitted to pleasantry were treated in this way. Brébeuf himself, the pompous author of "Pharsalia," wrote the coldest and most wearisome parody of Lucan, so widespread was the taste for burlesque. Every one dabbled in it, even the footmen and the ladies' maids;

---

THE GROTESQUES

for most people thought that it was quite enough to string together burlesque rimes, extravagant and coarse words, — in a word, to speak the tongue of the marketplace, — to become a comic poet. The octosyllabic verse with simple rimes, which Scarron almost invariably made use of and in which he wrote “Typhon” and “Virgil Travestied,” offers facilities which it is difficult not to take advantage of. In the hands of a mediocre versifier it soon becomes looser and less elevated than careless prose, and offers naught to compensate the ear but a rime which wearies by its immediate repetition. When well handled, this verse (which is that in which the Spanish romances and comedies are written) is capable of producing new and varied effects. To us it seems better fitted than the pompous and redundant alexandrine to familiar dialogue, to bright details, and we wish it could be used on the stage. It would save us many a stereotyped hemistich, which the best and most careful poets can scarcely get rid of, so surely do the indispensable cæsure and the rime of hexameter verse compel their use. The octosyllabic verse, in consequence of its being used especially for buffooneries, was called the burlesque verse, although it lends itself equally well to noble and serious expression. It is in that metre that worthy Loret, the journalist of his time, wrote his "Historic Muse."

The burlesque, or, if you prefer it, the grotesque, has always existed both in art and nature, as a contrast and a set-off. The world is full of animals the nature and existence of which are inexplicable save by the law of opposition; their ugliness evidently serves to bring out the beauty of the higher and nobler beings. But for the demon, the angel would not be as splendid as he is, and the toad makes the beauty of the humming-bird more remarkable and striking. Life is manifold, and many heterogeneous elements enter into the make-up of facts and events. The most touching situation has its comical side, and laughter often breaks out through tears. Any art, therefore, which seeks to be true, is bound to admit both sides. Tragedy and comedy are too arbitrary in their exclusiveness; no action can be wholly terrifying or wholly amusing. There are very comical sides to the most serious events, and very sad ones to the most farcical adventures. Tragedy and comedy are therefore classical poems, since, in accordance with conventions settled on beforehand, they reject the expression of certain feelings and certain ideas. The somewhat dry, clear-cut French mind accepts readily enough these divisions and compartments in the domain of art. Weep or laugh, then, through five acts, if you like; but that desire for harmony and regularity can be satisfied only through the sacrifice of colour and tone. The result is a monochrome literature which resembles the combats of gladiators painted in red ochre of which Horace speaks, or the camaieu paintings with which the artists of the last century adorned panels and bays. One poem is blue, another green; the modelling is brought out, as in gray monochromes, by the contrast of light and shade; in neither are the varied tints of nature harmoniously combined. We shall not, because we happen to be speaking of Scarron, re-state here the thesis of the grotesque so eloquently maintained in a famous preface. From the time of Malherbe the French language has been the victim of an absolutely amazing fit of prudery and preciosity as regards ideas and expressions. Every detail was proscribed as being familiar, every word in ordinary use as being low or prosaic. Writers came to use some five or six hundred words only, and the literary language was, by comparison with the ordinary tongue, like an abstract dialect for the sole use of scholars. Side by side with this highly aristocratic and disdainful poetry arose a style thoroughly in opposition to it, but certainly just as false, the burlesque, which insisted on looking only at the deformed and grimacing aspect of things, carefully seeking triviality, and making use of popular or ridiculous expressions only. It was the opposite excess, that is all. We willingly accept buffoonery, the invention of comic details, the lightness of style, the delightful strangeness of words, the unexpectedness and comicality of rimes, and the wildest fancies in every style of writing; but we confess we cannot understand parody and travesty. "Virgil Travestied," one of Scarron's chief works, which gained him his reputation, is unquestionably one of those which we least like, although it is full of amusing hits and droll lines. For what does it mean, after all? To substitute for the hero a dull, clownish cit, for a fair princess a coarse kitchen wench, and to make these characters speak the language of the market-place, is not in itself a very amusing performance. There is no masterpiece which could not, by applying this process, be made as dull as ditchwater.

---

---

We can understand parody in the critical sense ; that is, by making use of a certain humorous exaggeration to bring out the defects of the work travestied, to make the ridicule or the danger of it more striking, as in "Don Quixote," when the hero speaks of Amadis of Gaul, of Galaor, Agesilan of Colchos, Lancelot of the Lake, Esplandian, and other romances of chivalry. We have seen the parodies of all the plays which have met with success for the past ten years, and although it is true that there is, even in the least envious of men, a little feeling of malevolence which makes him listen with a certain satisfaction to pleasantries directed against a popular tragedy or drama, we must confess we have never derived the least enjoyment from these performances. Scarron, by the way, shared our opinion about parodies, and the manner in which he speaks of them in a letter to M. Deslandes-Payen, to whom he dedicates the fifth canto of "Virgil Travestied," proves a modesty which is almost unjust: "I am ready to declare under my hand and seal, in the presence of whomsoever you please, that the paper which I use up in writing is so much spoilt paper, and that one would be justified in asking me, as was asked of Ariosto, where I find so many. . . . And these parodies of books, my own ‘Virgil’ first and foremost, are nothing but . . . and it is a bad omen for the compilers of coarse words, for those who have attacked Virgil, those who have attacked me, like a poor dog who is gnawing his bone, and those who indulge in that form of writing as being the easiest,—it is, I say, a very bad omen for these most fire-deserving burlesques that this year, which has produced them in such numbers and which perhaps has been as much troubled by them as by chafers, should not have produced an abundance of corn. Perhaps the best minds, which have been enrolled to keep our language clean and sweet, will regulate the matter, and the punishment of the first joker who shall be convicted of having relapsed into the burlesque, and therefore condemned to work the rest of his life for the idlers of the New Bridge, will dispel the regrettable storm of burlesque which threatens the realm of Apollo. For my part, I am always ready to abjure a style which has spoilt every one; and but for the express order of a person of rank who has full power over me, I should leave ‘Virgil’ to those who want it so much, and I should be satisfied with my fruitless post of invalid, which is more than sufficient to keep a whole man busy."

PAUL SCARRON

It appears from this letter that Scarron did not lack for imitators and copyists, and that he had to fight for his parody of "Virgil." The method of publication that he had adopted favoured frauds by writers who wished to continue the work. At first he was to have published one canto a month, but whether suffering prevented his doing so, or whether — which is more likely — he got sick and weary of the work, he did not punctually fulfil his engagement, and there were long delays between the times of the publication of the different parts of his poem. To keep up so prolonged a joke certainly needs all the spirit of Scarron, his masterly skill in handling the octosyllabic line, his readiness in inventing unexpected rimes and piquant turns, suspensions, bold overlappings, curious cæsuras, — in a word, whatever can vary such a long work. Even in the midst of innumerable incongruities, each more startling than its predecessor, occur passages really well written, the familiar literalness of which reproduces the antique very much better than the serious translations in a fine style. Judicious remarks comment the text. "Be just and fear the gods.' This maxim is sound and good, but of what use is it in hell?" It is impossible to ridicule more wittily the famous line, —

“Discite justitiam moniti et non temnere divos !”

“The Æneid Travestied” was never carried beyond the eighth canto. The “Comic Romance” itself is unfinished, either through caprice or fatigue. We rather like those interrupted books which compel the imagination of the reader to invent the close.

The “Virgil” was continued, if it may be called continued, by a certain Jaques Moreau, Marquis or Count of Brazey, and by another writer whose name has remained unknown. It is difficult to read anything flatter, more vulgar, and more insipid. Offray did not meet with much more success in his continuation of the “Comic Romance.” The immortal author of “Don Quixote,” Don Miguel Cervantes de Saavedra, having allowed a long interval to elapse between the publication of the first and the latter part of his novel, suffered also from the unpleasantness of having his work continued by a sacrilegious scribbler; but Cid Hamet-Ben-Engeli hung his pen so high up that no one since then has been able to take it down.

“Typhon,” which was composed before “Virgil Travestied,” is a burlesque poem on the war of the gods and the giants. It contains five cantos in octosyllabic verse. If ever there was a sinister and grandiose mythological personage, it surely is the shapeless monster which Juno, jealous of her husband’s creation,—he having brought forth Pallas alone,—caused to spring from the ground. His gigantic revolt has a mysterious and cosmogonic character as terrifying as the bassi-relievi carved in the caves of Ellora, which represent events the memory and symbolical meaning of which have been lost, but which one feels must have been terrible. Typhon nearly made heaven and earth change places. He slashed off Jupiter’s legs and arms with a diamond scythe, and filled the inhabitants of Olympus with such panic terror that, in order to escape, they assumed the shape of animals or of vegetables, under which forms they were worshipped by the Egyptians. His aspect was formidable and monstrous. He had a hundred heads, and from his hundred mouths came forth flames and such awful cries that gods and men trembled at the sound. The principal part of his body was covered with feathers, the lower part spread out into dragon’s-tails. This giant, repulsive though he was, managed to marry, and by Echidna, his spouse, had a whole hideous family of monsters: Orcus, Cerberus, the Lernean Hydra, the Chimæra, the Sphinx, the Nemæan lion. Finally Jupiter, having recovered his legs and arms, thanks to the skill of Mercury and Pan, sprang on a car drawn by winged horses and hurled his lightnings so fiercely and constantly at Typhon that he overthrew him; and, to prevent his rising again, he placed upon his breast Mount Ætna, which since then has never ceased to hurl against heaven, as a mark of contempt and revolt, blasts of flame, rocks, torrents of lava, and whirlwinds of smoke.

Now, here is how Scarron has caricatured the epic subject and reproduced the colossal struggle.

At the opening of the poem the gods are feasting in a macaronic Olympus after the manner of the country of Cogaigue; they have drunk more nectar than is good for them and have surfeited themselves with ambrosia. Jupiter is asleep with his head on the table; Juno is stretched out on her couch with very little on her; Mars, who has just come from Flanders, is drinking beer and smoking tobacco like a regular trooper. As for Venus, she is ogling a young, beardless god, whom she proposes to initiate into the mysteries of love.

Typhon and his friends the giants are also enjoying themselves on earth in their own fashion. They are playing at skittles in the fields of Thessaly. You understand, of course, that the nine-pins of these fellows are no mere children's toys ; they are huge rocks — as high as the steeple of Strasburg Cathedral — which Typhon has rooted up with his powerful hands and roughly fashioned into shape. A huge piece of a mountain scarcely rough-hewn serves as a bowl. The bowling party causes earthquakes all through the countryside. The giants, however, have not yet warmed up ; they are playing carefully, as is the way at first. Little by little the game becomes more animated, and Mimas, hurling the bowl, hits Typhon's foot just upon his tender corn. Typhon, crazed with pain but unable to blame Mimas, who did not do it on purpose, picks up the nine-pins and hurls them into the air with such vigour that they break through the blue vault of heaven and fall upon the dresser of the gods, smashing all the glass-ware and china. Jupiter wakes with a start at the crash of the broken crockery, and asks in a transport of rage what such a bacchanalian performance means. "Your Majesty," replies Pallas, "it is the work of some frightful engine directed from the earth against the heavens, which has caused the damage on your dresser. All the glasses are broken, and hereafter we shall have to drink out of the palms of our hands like beggars or cynical philosophers." "It is nine-pins and a bowl," adds Momus, the pretty buffoon. "So," says Jupiter, "heaven can be broken into! It can be burst open as if it were a paper ceiling. We are no longer safe in this azure concern. The sons of earth are becoming more and more insolent, but I shall take them down pretty quickly. I shall thunder and hail and rain on them in such fashion that they will soon return to their duty."

The conversation has reached this point when enters Apollo, who has finished his day's work, stabled his nags, and put his car in the barn. Naturally he is better informed than any one of what happens on earth, which, in virtue of his rank as Grand Duke of the Candles (a title given to him by Dubartas), it is his business to illumine. He saw Typhon, who was playing with his company in Thessaly, hurling the nine-pins toward heaven. "That rascal is making me mad at last, and I am getting pretty Olympically angry," says Jupiter, bending his moleskin brows. "Here, Mercury, put on as quickly as you can your winged shoes — they have just been re-soled ; and you go and tell that scamp that if he does not keep quiet he will have me to deal with." The son of Cyllene puts on his travelling-cap, ties his wings on his feet with a piece of stout cord, takes his stick entwined with eels, bows like a chorister boy, and is off. He flashes through the air, traverses the clouds, and stops upon Helicon only to have a bite and a sup. There he finds the Nine Muses busy sifting rondeaus, winnowing sonnets, and picking out "Joys" and "Regrets." It is natural to old maids and devotees to practise the manufacture of preserves, so the Muses present Mercury with a pot of cherries and the remains of a pasty which Apollo had cut into the night before. When Mercury has eaten, he wipes his mouth with the back of his hand, like a well-bred god who has not been furnished with a napkin, and he starts off again at the double to fulfil his commission.

At dusk he reaches the place where are the giants. It is still light enough to see, but Night soon shakes out her skirts spangled with stars. The rascals are in a plain not far from a forest, building a huge pile, on which they propose to grill some meat. The whole forest is cut down for the purpose. It makes a vast heap of knotty oaks, of branching pines, of uprooted elms, so that one might well believe they proposed to burn down the earth. Hundreds of oxen, still yoked to the ploughs and cut in quarters, are roasting on that ocean of coals; thousands of sheep, stuck like larks upon spits made of whole cypresses, are turning slowly in front of the fire. The supper must have caused a whole nation to starve.

The giants surround Mercury, who does not feel particularly brave when he sees closing around him that band of monstrous bodies. However, he summons up all his courage and addresses the following speech to Typhon, who looks at him crossly and with his most frightful mien: "Sir Typhon, in spite of your giant size you are only a big rascal. Jove, my master and yours, has sent me to tell you that you have got to keep yourselves quiet henceforth, otherwise he will unhesitatingly smite you with lightnings. You have smashed up all our crockery, and you have got to start at once for Venice to fetch a hundred glasses to replace those broken by your nine-pins. Who breaks, pays, — you are drunkard enough to know that maxim.

THE GROTESQUES

You have a week to do it in, but not another minute. And now, good-night."

Mercury has scarcely ended his speech when a formidable howl, fit to deafen the four elements, issues from mouths bigger than ovens, from chests deeper than caverns. Mercury nearly bleeds at the ears from it, like a gunner who has been firing the whole day. "Get out of this quickly, you ass, you fool, or I will push you alive into the fire!" shouts Typhon. "I laugh at your master and his fireworks and crackers." Thereupon the colossus begins to devour, with his band, mountains of half-grilled flesh, and soon goes to sleep by the dying fire, after having put under his head, by way of a pillow, a rock which fifty thousand men could not budge.

Poor Mercury, much terrified, climbs a tree, in which he perches till the return of dawn, the roads not being very safe, and infested with highwaymen. Day having come he gets off his perch and starts on his way. He finds Jupiter still in bed, but the god scarcely takes time to put on a dressing-gown, so eager is he to learn the news brought from earth by his messenger. "All I could get in reply," says Mercury to the master of the gods, "was impertinence. The insolent fellows laughed in my face, and they very nearly played practical jokes upon me. Typhon in particular received me as if I had been a peddler. May I be smitten with seven-years itch if I have not said the truth, as naked as when it rose out of its well."

The council of the gods is assembled, and the question as to whether active measures shall be taken or not is discussed. The giants also are consulting and stirring. Enceladus, whose name rimes so happily in French with escalade, insists upon fetching Jupiter out of his aerial cubbyhole, and proposes to turn out all the inhabitants of the starry mansions; he does not need any one to help him in this enterprise, he will himself have all the danger and all the glory. Typhon joyfully listens to his bluster, and the whole giant band shouts in acquiescence. Mimas brays with delight; Porphyrio stretches out his wild-beast's claws; Polybotes, with a snout like a whale's, grunts heavily; Asius, the great bear-slayer, Thaon, Ephialtes, Coeus, Iapetus, Echion, Almops, all shout as if they were mad, "Long live Typhon! Death to the gods!"

Meanwhile Jupiter curses and swears in his Olympus like a carter in a hollow road in Lower Brittany. The stock of ammunition is inspected, and proves to be not very considerable; Mercury, the factotum, is therefore sent off to the vapour-producing god. This deity refuses at first to give clouds on credit, for a large amount is already owing him,—no one being paid in heaven; yet in view of the urgent danger, he replies that he will send up enough to satisfy Master Jove. Mercury, on his way, puts into his pocket the “Gazette” and the “Extra,” which contain information about the forces of the giants.

The council of the gods resembles very much a terrestrial council. The members dispute upon the order of their going and precedence. Neptune, who is no great orator and is only good at grumbling, gets tangled up in his speech. Mars plays the part of Captain Slasher, the mountain-slicer; with the mere wind of his sword he will overthrow the army of the giants. Vulcan offers to make such complicated gratings and locks for the windows and doors of Olympus that Typhon will break his nails on them. The day is wasted in ridiculous discussions, and Jupiter adjourns the meeting. Every one returns to his own place without matters having progressed in the least.

At the beginning of the third canto Apollo sends up the clouds called for. They are clouds of the best quality, full of nitre, sulphur, and rosin ; the air is darkened by them ; never was a London fog so thick. Under cover of those clouds, which prevent the earth being seen from heaven, Enceladus begins to pile up one mountain on another like a mason laying bricks. He heaps Pelion on Ossa, and makes such a prodigious pile that he gets as high as the lodging of the Olympians, the walls of which he reaches by means of a flying bridge. Jupiter, wanting to find out what kind of weather it is outside, opens a window and is horribly scared at finding himself face to face with the monstrous giant. Happily, the window is too narrow for the latter to pass through. Jupiter shouts, "Help, help!" calls for his powder-box, rolls up his shirt-sleeves, and prepares to launch a thunderbolt at the giant's head ; but the latter, seeing his danger, shoves into the window the huge trunk of a cedar. Jupiter narrowly escapes being spitted and stuck against the wall like an owl on a gamekeeper's door. The alarm is given. The gods cast over the battlements of the celestial ramparts faggots, lumps of plaster, stools, liquids of all sorts except scents, and pans full of boiling butter. Enceladus is hit on the mouth by one, and although the butter is very hot, it cools his courage and induces him to give up his place to Mimas, who, being rather thinner, succeeds in making his way through the opening.

---

The battle now becomes general. Jupiter mounts his eagle and heads a sortie, accompanied by all the gods. His lightnings at first terrify the giants, but they are more scared than hurt. Mars and Enceladus challenge each other to single combat; they turn out to be so formidable that they turn their backs upon each other after an exchange of insults like Homeric heroes. During the battle an old gipsy succeeds in sending to Jupiter by a footman a letter couched thus: "Tiresias and Proteus have foretold that this war can end to the glory of the gods only through the help of the son of a mortal woman. Such is the decree of fate." This piece of information causes deep discouragement throughout Olympus, and the gods are already beaten when Typhon returns with fresh giants clad in armour of stone. The rout is complete, and Jupiter takes to his heels, shouting, "Save himself who can!" The gods and goddesses follow his example, sprinting like Basques or record runners. To escape the huge rascals, who are following them with strides longer than Jack the Giant Killer's with his seven-leagued boots, they are obliged to conceal themselves by assuming the shapes of animals. Jupiter turns into a ram, Juno into a cow, as she is entitled to do through her name βοῶπις; Neptune into a greyhound, Momus into a monkey, Apollo into a crow, Bacchus into a goat, Pan into a rat, Diana into a cat, Venus into a kid, Mercury into a stork. The giants, who are naturally rather dull, do not know what has become of their enemies, and while they are looking for them, these, protected by their disguise, succeed in reaching the banks of the Nile, where they will wait for a change of fortune and for the time when they shall have a chance to punish that impious and brutal race.

The celestial company approaches Memphis. Jupiter, who is not used to wearing wool, is very warm and perspires freely. He drags himself painfully along; he has run a thorn into his foot, and falls helplessly on the tender grass. In this attitude he bleats out a harangue in Greek, and directs Mercury to steal some clothes, if possible, to enter the near-by town and to fetch some garments for the gods: the pearl necklace which Venus has kept on, will defray the cost.

Mercury, still under the appearance of a stork, flies to the banks of the Nile, where some natives are engaged in bathing and in looking for crocodile's eggs. The god of thieves, who naturally is a past master in stealing, seizes a tunic and assumes his own form, under which he enters Memphis. He loads a mule with a regular second-hand stock of doublets, cloaks, skirts, and drawers, which the gods put on after having thrown off their animal disguises. They put up at an inn, the host of which is a cuckold and his wife a coquette, quite a likely alliteration and connection. Soon their godhead reveals itself by a symptom which you will never guess, and the whole responsibility of which we leave to Scarron's buffoonery — the mysterious travelers are noticeable for the delightful odour which they exhale. This peculiarity so greatly surprises the inhabitants of the town that they thereupon do not hesitate to believe their guests divine beings. It should be added that they walk, or rather glide, without raising their feet, as if they were skating, which is a distinctive attribute of the higher powers. The priests of Memphis, informed of these facts, bring to the celestial strangers four puncheons of genuine balm, fish from the Nile, crocodiles, hippopotami, and two pairs of cleaned gloves.

Hereupon Hercules, who had been busy somewhere else, joins the celestial band, which his arrival cheers up, and Mercury is again despatched to spy out what the giants are doing. He finds them still heaping mountains on mountains and turning Thessaly into a perfect break-neck country. Typhon has raised his platform so high that the giants will soon be able to sit down on Jupiter's throne; but he has reckoned without his host. The celestial army arrives quietly, followed by carts filled with ammunition manufactured in Memphis. Jupiter hurls a thunderbolt, merely, however, to effect a diversion and to conceal the real attack. The colossi, half asleep, turn out of bed in their drawers, and hurry in the direction where the thunder is pealing. While they are rubbing with their fingers, which are as big as pillars, their eyes, which are as big as bucklers, the gods invade their camp and soon the mêlée becomes general. The most terrific blows are exchanged. Several of the giants are killed, greatly to their annoyance, considering that they never have been dead before that time; and after many ups and downs, the giants' army is routed, thanks to the valour of Hercules, who was born of a mortal woman, and the gipsy's prediction is fulfilled. Typhon, springing from summit to summit, legs it over the boot of Italy and escapes to Sicily, whither Jupiter pursues him, overthrows him, and sticks Mount Ætna like a nightmare on his chest, greatly to his discomfort. Ever since, when Typhon coughs an eruption takes place; when he turns over an earthquake occurs.

“And thus almost always is vice Duly punished at the last
And never did rebellion
Its punishment escape.”

The gigantomachia, of which we have given a succinct summary, is full of amusing lines, of naïve expressions, of idioms unmistakably native. It is to be regretted that the prudish taste which rules at present and which does not permit the least freedom of style, even in a purely philosophical and literary study, forbids our quoting the brightest and drollest traits. Of yore the French language did not set such high store on seemliness in words as it does nowadays. Our old story-tellers were allowed a freedom of speech which no one could indulge in to-day, and in the facetious style we count a great many masterpieces. Rabelais, Béroalde de Verville, the Queen of Navarre, Bonaventure Des Periers, wrote in a striking manner and in an uncommon style, of which La Fontaine's "Tales" give but a very dim idea. It is in the works of these authors that the real Gallic wit shows in fullest brilliancy, and it is a pity that English cant, which has influenced our manners, should deprive us of those jolly, if somewhat broad farces, in which the comicalness of the expression makes one forget the somewhat licentious details. Scarron, by the innate character of his style, clings to the old idiom, and by comparison with several of his contemporaries he is somewhat archaic, the burlesque style being composed of innumerable proverbial expressions, familiar locutions, and popular idioms, which long persisted in conversation after having been banished from the more elevated style. What we have said of Scarron may be said of other and more illustrious writers. Molière, although he writes at the same time as Racine, uses a language which is a hundred years older. We do not mean to cast any blame upon him in saying this, for in our opinion Molière's language is one of the finest which man has ever spoken; we mean only that tragedy, at least as the Classicists understand it, contains fewer idioms than comedy.

Boileau is not very kind to Scarron, and to his "Typhon" in particular. Every one knows these lines of the "Art of Poetry": —

THE GROTESQUES

---

“ . . . The court, at last enlightened,
Distinguished between simplicity and dull buffoonery,
And left it to the provinces to admire ‘ Typhon.’ ”

But Boileau, apart from the haughty delicacy of his taste, possibly had a grudge against Scarron. Giles Boileau, the poet's elder brother, had waged with our author a war of epigrams. He had even gone so far as to attack Madame Scarron's virtue in the following :—

“ Pray see on what you found your mistaken notion,
Scarron, when you think that all society
Visits you your conversation to enjoy.
What ! can you not see, fool that you are,
That if you scratched that head of yours
The reason you soon would guess ? ”

Scarron, exceedingly angered, replied by a deluge of epigrams which do not all, it must be confessed, savour of Attic salt, but rather of coarse saltpetre. He replies to Giles' insults by charging him with walking at night on the Mégisserie quay, the Champs-Élysées of the day, for equivocal and monstrous assignations. It was then the habit of scholars and literary men who quarrelled to turn to Sodom and Gomorrah for insulting epithets. In this case, at least, the cruelty of the attack excuses the violence of the retort.

“Typhon,” which, Boileau himself acknowledged, began well and wittily, is dedicated to his Eminence Cardinal Jules Mazarin. The dedication exhibits a curious likeness to the “Mazarinade” by the same author. Scarron calls Mazarin a great man, a Julius greater than the great Julius, the Alcides on whom Atlas may lean when he is weary; he beseeches him to cast from the summit of his Olympus a glance upon the poor poet; if he obtains it, he will be as pleased as if he had recovered health and as if, being no longer impotent, he could make a deep bow to his Eminence. It would appear that either Mazarin did not particularly appreciate the compliment, or that, foreseeing some largesse which he was expected to make, some new pension to be paid (Scarron had one already from the Queen), he turned a deaf ear to the appeal and destroyed the hopes which the poet had built upon his dedication.

Scarron’s admiration for the great Julius died out forthwith, and a complete change took place in his appreciation of the scarlet minister. It was in this new frame of mind that he wrote the “Mazarinade.” It would be hard to go further in the way of outrage and filth; it resembles Juvenal’s work without its righteous indignation. Looking at it from the literary point of view simply, the piece, which is very long, contains passages of remarkable fire, spirit, and wit, but of that atrocious wit with which Catullus lights up his epigrams against Mamurra. He reproaches the Cardinal, among other crimes, — and no doubt it was the blackest in his eyes, — with keeping his purse closed to the poor devils called poets, cherished by the late red-capped Richelieu, who feared above all things to see his high deeds tarnished by these divine starving ones. He brings up against him the ballet of “Orpheus,” which put every one to sleep; his choir of male soprani; his courtesans; his guards; his two hundred dressing-gowns; his amber and musk perfumes; his card-playing; his double loves in which he exhibited himself as a man to women, and as a woman to men; and many another peccadillo of the same sort, which the Cardinal, accustomed as he was to the excesses of the pamphleteers, would not have minded, for he had taken for his motto, “Let them sing, provided they pay.” But Scarron does not stop there; he cuts the Cardinal to the quick by relating the story of his loves with a fruit girl of Alcalá, — an adventure which had cost him a thrashing and the good graces of his patron, Cardinal Colonna. Not a single detail is omitted. Scarron tells how, driven out of Alcala, Mazarin goes off on foot, in very humble fashion, to Barcelona, whence he returns to his country the best way he can, and sets about rebuilding his fortunes by filling, in the household of a purple-robed Jupiter, the office of Ganymede. Then he casts up at him his political blunders and crimes. He upbraids him for his insolent simony in the matter of benefices; for having twice failed to take Lerida; he recalls Courtrai evacuated by the garrison, thanks to his trickery; the fruits of the battle of Lens lost through his delays; Catalonia in despair; the Duke of Guise wretchedly lodged in Naples, where he is abandoned; the Duke of Beaufort caged; the duchy of Cardone stolen; the late Chief-Justice Barillon poisoned; parliament outraged; the English whom he is starving to death; their unhappy Queen whom he has robbed of her rings, and I know not how many black deeds more or less true, in return for which he hopes to see —

“His disembowelled carcass
Torn to pieces by the rabble.”

We have quoted merely the gentlest insults; the others are marked by a virulence which the Latins themselves have not surpassed. His burlesque wit is carried to the point of ferocity; his pleasantries are too literally bloody, his poetic anger turns to rage, and one is amazed that there could be so much bitterness in that little wizened body. Father Duchêne pales by the side of Scarron, who carries very far indeed resentment for the neglect of a dedication and a handsome binding. Mazarin, who was clever enough to laugh at good hits in the pamphlets and songs written against him, thought this time that the joke was rather too strong and the style rather too free; nevertheless, it does not appear that he sought to be avenged for it.

Scarron's apartment was the meeting place of the Frondeurs. This was the name given, as is well known, to the partisans of the Parliament, while those who stood up for the royal authority were called Mazarins. The Prince of Condé did not go there himself, but he sent members of his household. There were privately read "The Advice of Ten Millions and more," "The Burlesque Courier of the War in Paris," "The Juliad," "The Bird's Song," "The Frondeur Triolets."

Mazarin's people also had their poets and their writers. Cyrano de Bergerac, who belonged to the Cardinal's party, launched, by way of a reply to Scarron, whom he designates by the transparent anagram Ronscar, an epistle most slashingly written. Cyrano, whose numerous duels, fought on account of the shape of his nose, caused him to appear, even when writing, like a hectoring bully, treats poor Scarron most contemptuously. He tells him that he has never seen any ridicule so serious or any seriousness so ridiculous as his; he accuses him of having degraded Virgil, and calls him an angry frog croaking in the marshes of Parnassus. He affirms that what Scarron writes is fit only for fishwives, and that when the slang of the market-place changes, Scarron will cease to be understood. Then, passing to a description of the man himself, he declares that if Death wanted to dance a saraband, it would take a pair of Ronscars for castanets. For ten years past the Fates have twisted his neck without succeeding in choking him. To see his arms twisted and stiffened upon his hips, his body might be mistaken for a gallows on which

• the devil had hanged a soul. And such a soul! More hideous than its body. That deformed monster, allowed to remain on earth as a living example of the vengeance of God, has dared to vomit its slime and venom upon the purple of a prince of the Church who, under the auspices of Louis, directs so successfully the greatest state in Christendom. The sight of a scarlet hat drives him wild, like a bull or a turkey-cock, and he even refused to listen to "a sweet sonnet" of Cyrano's, and forced the person who had opened it to put it back in his pocket. — Certainly we cannot doubt that Cyrano de Bergerac did profess great admiration for Cardinal Mazarin and was entirely devoted to him, and yet that little rather sweet sonnet, "which must have seemed tasteless to so highly spiced a man," had probably something to do with this exhibition of wrath.

Scarron, moreover, was unlucky with dedications. His father, who was a man of curious temper, a sort of Cynical philosopher, queer and strange in his behaviour, was imprudent enough to enter into a plot with some of the councillors in order to traverse a design which the Cardinal-Duke Armand de Richelieu was greatly bent on carrying out. The wearer of the scarlet robe was not accustomed to deal gently with political pranks, and yet he showed comparative clemency when he was satisfied with exiling Councillor Scarron to Touraine. Fortunately for him, the good man had some property near Amboise. Thither he withdrew, and kept quiet. Our poet, who knew the Cardinal to bear a grudge as long as a Spaniard and to be as vindictive as a Corsican, allowed some time to pass. When he thought that the Cardinal's resentment at the affair had died down, he ventured to address a petition to his Eminence, a step which had been rendered the more necessary owing to the fact that during the absence of Scarron senior the step-mother, who had remained in Paris, had left no stone unturned to get possession of all the property, and that the pension of the poor invalid, as may be readily believed, was not very regularly paid. In this petition, one of his best poems, he begs of his lordship the Cardinal to pardon his father, whom he excuses to the best of his ability. Since that unfortunate exile, Paul, son of Paul, had fallen a victim to a very dangerous malady : —

“ It is poverty, which destroys all minds
And all bodies when them it takes.
It seized on me when that poor father mine,
Who to you alone looks for recovery,
Was seized with a certain ill one gets in Parliament
And which nowhere else is to be feared.
This disease, named a zeal for investigation,
Is in our day making many a head sore.”

While asking leave for his father to return, he asks also to be given some small benefice, but he does this in a timid, side fashion, and merely to put his name down for a vacancy. The petition closes with these four verses, — that is, in vile prose in the year 1642 : —

“ Done at Paris on this last day of October,
By me, Scarron, who against my will am sober,
In the year that famous Perpignan was taken,
And without a cannon-shot the town of Sedan.”

This was flattering the Cardinal in a way to which he was very sensitive ; so when Scarron’s epistle was read to him, he approved of it as rather neatly turned, and repeated several times that it was amusingly dated. Unfortunately, the poet was unable to benefit by the good-will of his Eminence, who died very shortly afterwards, — an event which Scarron deploras in this wise in another petition addressed to the King : —

“ I have been for four years past a victim to a hideous ill,
Which seeks to destroy me.
It makes me weep like a calf, very often like a couple,
Sometimes like four of them.
Close pressed by my misfortunes I sought to present
A petition to the Cardinal ;
So some lines I wrote by dint of scratching
My ear and my head.
That great statesman listened to my plea

---

And thought it neat ;
But hereupon came death to carry him away,
And brought to me naught."

Thanks to the protection of Mlle. de Hautefort, he had been presented to the Queen, who deigned to permit him to call himself her invalid by appointment, a function which he fulfilled in the most conscientious way possible. The Queen granted him a present of five hundred crowns. By dint of petitions and requests, importunities and protection, he succeeded in having this gift changed into a sort of pension, paid as regularly as it could be in view of the troubled times and the disordered finances. Scarron, who had borne the title of abbé gratuitously for nearly forty years, would have been glad to justify it by the possession of some benefice, a priory, a prebend, or something else ; but the licentious life he had led and the buffoonery which formed his stock in trade were scarcely compatible with clerical functions, even if his infirmities had not made it impossible for him to discharge these. He asked for a benefice which would call for so little work that, to do it, it would be enough to believe in God. It was again Mlle. de Hautefort, his good angel, who gained for him the satisfaction of his constant desire. She induced Monsignor de Lavardin, Bishop of Mans, where she had an estate, to offer a benefice in his diocese to poor Scarron, whose undoubted paralysis allowed the most prudish women to support and recommend him as warmly as possible. Our poet, satisfied on this point, had yet another ambition, which was never fulfilled, that of being given apartments in the Louvre. The hope that this would be done was long held out to him, but he had to be satisfied with the hope.

It would be a mistake, after all, to allow these complaints of wretchedness and distress to lead us to believe that Scarron was really poverty-stricken. That sort of poetical mendicancy was then fashionable and in no way dishonourable. Authors sought to gain protectors, to obtain gifts, pensions, or pecuniary assistance by means of flattering sonnets, of prefatory epistles, or of dedications. As the court was the supreme arbiter, and as a word from a duke, a smile from a marchioness sufficed to make a work fashionable, it was natural that authors should endeavour to win the good opinion of persons of high station by all possible cajolery; and every one knows that in the way of flattery there can be none too gross, especially for courtiers who are accustomed to consider themselves as the paragon and acme of all perfections. Expressions which to-day strike us as so abject did not degrade the persons who made use of them, any more than the formulæ which are still used nowadays at the end of a letter. Then it must not be forgotten that in those days nobles and titled persons were considered as belonging to a superior race, as visible deities, of whom it was no more humiliating to ask for favours than to ask of God himself, so great was the distance which separated the protector from the protégé. No doubt the dignity of man seems to have gained by the pride which writers nowadays exhibit. They no longer prefix to their books epistles on bended knees, in which the author sets above the Mæcenas of antiquity an ass of a nobleman, in the hope of being repaid with a few crowns; but, on the other hand, they no longer frequent high society, and no longer live on an intimate footing with princes and men of rank. Reduced to their own resources, they are bound down to incessant work and must all lack leisure, the tenth Muse, and the most inspiring of all. If they do not sacrifice their pride, they have to sacrifice their art; the honour of the individual is untouched, but the glory of the poet declines.

Scarron, though he pretended that he was lodged in Poverty House, really lived in a rather pretty home. His bedchamber was hung with yellow damask, and the furniture had cost six thousand crowns. He wore a velvet dress, ate well, had several servants, and kept up his establishment in fairly good style. The pension he received from the Queen, that given him by his father, the income from his benefice, and the money he made from his books must have abundantly met his expenses. His “marquisate of Quinet” — that was the name he gave to the income from his books; his bookseller was called Quinet — brought him in handsome sums, so he was not to be pitied quite as much as he claimed; if he suffered all the torments of Job, he was at least never reduced to sitting on a dunghill and scraping himself with a shard. His dunghill was a very comfortable armchair, admirably upholstered, with arms and a board so arranged that he could work when gout did not torture him too much. He even had a secretary, or a lackey who acted as such, if we may believe these lines: —

“ And the valet whom I employed to write,
Another demon who was never seen to laugh,
And whose indifferent and cold ways
Would have made even a monk swear right out,
Ceasing at last to be my servant,
Rid me of a glum lunatic.”

He met frequently and on familiar terms the Countess du Lude, Mme. de la Suze, Mme. de Bassompierre, M. de Villequier, the Prince and Princess of Guémenée, Mme. de Blérancourt, the Duchess de Rohan, Mme. de Maugiron, Mme. de Bois-Dauphin, M. de Courcy, Major Aubry, Sarrazin, la Ménardière, and many others, his neighbours, who lived in the Place Royale or near it, and to whom he refers in some compliment or kindly mention in his farewell to the Marais, when he went to take tripe baths, at the Charity Hospital in the Faubourg Saint-Germain, in the hope of relieving his sufferings. The tripe baths were no more efficacious than the Bourbon waters which he had gone to take, and which had not even succeeded, as he comically says, in changing his worse into a simple ill. If these trips did not contribute to the recovery of his health, they at least served his fortunes. He met numbers of fine acquaintances, and established many connections with illustrious personages. The two "Legends of Bourbon," which may be classed among his most agreeable poems, gave him an opportunity of introducing all sorts of graceful remarks and flattering lines to the great personages whom he had met at the baths. It was there that he acquired a protector in the person of Gaston de France, Duke of Orléans, brother of Louis XIII, who deigned to inquire after the health of the poor devil and appeared to be interested in him. He bestirred himself to have Scarron senior recalled from exile; but whether he did not espouse his cause warmly enough, or whether Richelieu's resentment was still unappeased, the recalcitrant councillor was not recalled, and he died at Loches, in Touraine, without other diversion than the companionship of his friend Deslandes-Payen, a councillor of the High Court, Prior of Charité-sur-Loire, and Abbé of Mont-Saint-Martin.

The Duke of Saint-Aignan in particular was so tickled with a passage which referred to him in the "Legends of Bourbon" that he expressed his thanks to Scarron in a versified epistle of his own, to which the latter did not fail to reply. But those who welcomed him most warmly at Bourbon were a M. Fransaiche and his wife, who took him to their house, where he spent a month, gorged with good cheer and delicacies ; for amid all the ravage caused in our burlesque poet by disease, his appetite had not been touched ; his stomach seemed to have drawn to itself the life which gradually left the rest of his body. He was as fond of good eating as a devotee's cat, and left tid-bits to one side only to get better. So he speaks with a gratitude which gives you an appetite of the Maine capons and the partridge pasties which the ladies d'Hautefort and d'Escars gave him.

People of the highest rank often had dinner and supper parties at his house. The wine was good, the dishes choice, and the conversation of the brightest. It is probable that his illustrious guests did not let him bear the whole expense, that they sent him hampers of game, and baskets of wine, and that Scarron's share was only the table and the joints. Pretty faces even were not absent from the poet's home, although he was not yet married. He had taken into his house his father's two sisters by his first marriage, Anne and Frances. One of them had a nice figure, a charming voice, and was clever. The Duke de Trêmes, who frequented the home, took a fancy to her and paid her attentions which were received so favourably that a child was born. This child later married a lady called Anne de Thibourt, and became equerry to Mme. de Maintenon. Scarron was far from posing as a rigorous brother, and he said of his sisters that one was fond of drink and the other of men. This succinct appreciation appears to us to be justified. He also pretended that in Twelve Gates Street there were twelve light o' loves, counting the two Misses Scarron as one only. That poor street of the Marais is no longer gay, and virtue reigns in it between mouldy walls.

Although crippled in every limb, Scarron had a lively imagination. The reading of the Spanish authors, whom he studied assiduously (for he was very well acquainted with that tongue), filled his head with romantic adventures. A friend of his, Madaillan, resolved to play a joke upon him. He wrote him letters signed with a woman's name, and appointed a number of meetings to which the poor devil had himself carried in a bath chair, his only available mode of locomotion. Of course he only appeared at the rendezvous, and he understood that he had been tricked. Previously, however, a poetic correspondence had been entered upon between the mysterious lady and the paralytic gallant. He found it hard to forgive Madaillan for his joke, spoke of him in terms of grossest insult, and long bore him a grudge. Yet he had been duped by self-love only, and he alone had been the practical joker who had taken him in; for how could he have dared to believe for a moment that he had inspired a woman with a passion, or even a caprice. It is true that he reckoned upon the brightness of his wit and his literary reputation, which was considerable, to make her forget his bodily defects. Ill-favoured and deformed poets are always ready to believe in that queenly kiss which alighted on the lips of the sleeping Alain Chartier, although he was one of the ugliest of men. No doubt, too, our poet was so dried up that he caught fire easily. We beg to be allowed this poor conceit which he would not have refused himself the pleasure of uttering, in spite of the horror that, according to Cyrano de Bergerac, he professed for anything with a point to it.

---

It is not to vanity but to the goodness of his heart alone that the following action is to be attributed. Having learned that a certain Céleste de Palaiseau, whom he had loved before his illness, was in a condition bordering on indigence, he took her into his own home and exerted himself to such good effect that he obtained for her the priory of Argenteuil, which brought in an income of two thousand livres. The poor woman was born under an unlucky star; for she was weak enough and imprudent enough to resign her priory to a lady who literally allowed her to die of want.

To wind up these biographical details, let us come to the time when Scarron met Mlle. d'Aubigné, who later became his wife, and, later still, queen of France, with the title of Madame de Maintenon. If ever there was a life made up of adventures and ups and downs, it was unquestionably that of Mlle. d'Aubigné. It is as strange as truth, and yet no one would dare to write so improbable a novel. Mlle. d'Aubigné was descended from that famous d'Aubigné who made a name for himself under Henry III with the "Confessions of Sancy," and the "Satirical Divorce,"—dashing and sparkling works written in a style of remarkable firmness and energy. We shall not take up time by telling the story of Mlle. d'Aubigné, which is well enough known and which may be read in all sorts of books without our taking the trouble to transcribe it. On her return from America Madame d'Aubigné lodged with her daughter, then only fourteen years old, opposite Scarron's house.

The new neighbours gradually became acquainted, and our burlesque poet, who, in spite of his coarse pleasantries, was very kind-hearted, became interested in the misfortunes of Madame d'Aubigné, who was in most precarious circumstances. The girl struck him as being very charming, and he offered to marry her. Though he was impotent and twisted into the oddest of shapes, his proposal was not rejected, the only objection offered being that Mlle. d'Aubigné was much too young. It was agreed to delay the marriage for a couple of years; at the end of that time it was celebrated. Mother and daughter must have been brought very low to consent to such a match. It may be that they asked for the delay of two years in the hope that something better would turn up; but this was not the case, since Mlle. d'Aubigné became Madame Scarron. The following letter was written by Scarron to Mlle. d'Aubigné at the beginning of their intercourse, and is rather interesting:—

“I had always suspected that the little girl I saw six months ago come into my rooms with a dress too short for her and who began to cry, I know not why, was as clever as she seemed to be. The letter you wrote to Mlle. de Saint-Hermant is so bright that I am ill satisfied with my own cleverness, which did not make me perceive all the merit of yours soon enough. To tell the truth, I should have never supposed that the art of writing clever letters was taught in the islands of America or at the convent in Niort, and I cannot imagine why you should have been as careful to conceal your talents as every one else is to display his. Now that you are found out, you must not refuse to write to me as well as to Mlle. Saint-Hermant. I shall do my best to write letters as clever as yours, and you shall have the pleasure of seeing that I am far less talented than you are."

THE GROTESQUES

In another letter occurs this passage: "I am not sure that I should not have been wiser had I been on my guard against you the very first time I saw you. As things have turned out, I ought certainly to have been so; but pray, what likelihood was there that a young maid would upset an old bachelor; and who could have suspected that she could trouble me enough to make me regret my inability to take my revenge? A plague on me for loving you! How foolish I am to be so much in love! Every minute I feel like starting off for Poitou, and, considering the bitter cold, is it not a piece of madness? By Jove, come back, — since I am mad enough to set about regretting an absent beauty. I ought to have known myself better and to have remembered that it is sufficient to be crippled from head to foot, without suffering besides from that devilish sickness which is called impatience to see you again."

Is it not a strange sight and one affording food for reflection, to see the girl who later shared, or almost shared, the throne of France, enter into the humble abode of a poet with a skirt too short for her, for she had grown since it had been cut out and she had been too poor to buy another? And that ass Scarron, who wonders why she was crying! Why was she crying? Because her dress was not long enough. Is not that a sound reason, a genuine woman's reason?

Before he could marry, Scarron had to give up his benefice, which he sold to a valet of Ménage, a clever fellow whom his master was helping along. He also parted with a small estate which he had somewhere in Maine, and for which M. de Nublé handsomely paid him twenty-four thousand livres, the price of eighteen thousand livres, which had been put upon it at first, being below its real value. In spite of his marriage, Scarron, thanks to that desire for change of scene which is characteristic of invalids, had long entertained the notion of going to Martinique, whence one of his friends had returned completely cured of pains such as he suffered from. In a letter to Sarrazin, he states this intention in explicit terms: "I have therefore invested a thousand crowns in the new company of the Indies, which is about to found a colony three degrees from the equator on the banks of the Orillana and the Orinoco. Farewell to friends! farewell to Paris! farewell to you, tigresses disguised as angels! Farewell to the Ménages, to the Sarrazins, to the Marignys. I renounce burlesque verse, comic poems, and comedies, to go to a country where there are no sham saints, no rascally devotees, no Inquisition, no murderous winter, no crippling rheumatism, no worry to reduce me to starvation."

His match with Mlle. d'Aubigné was sure to revive the project, which, however, was never carried out. The course of events is truly wonderful. If through a combination of circumstances Scarron had not been prevented from carrying out his purpose, Mlle. d'Aubigné, now his wife, would have returned to America and the close of Louis XIV's reign would have been, no doubt, quite different. Mme. de Maintenon's influence was very great over the King, as he grew old and inclined to be morose, an inclination which she favoured, either to secure her influence or because of a religious feeling on her part which there is no reason to believe insincere. Although Mme. de Maintenon was something of a coquette, going so far as to be bled very frequently in order to preserve the delicate whiteness which was one of her chief beauties, the hard lessons which she had learned in adversity, and the many ups and downs of her fortune, must have filled her mind with a grave and sad feeling of the vanity of sublunary things. The woman who had slept between Ninon's sheets and under the roof of a poor deformed poet must, when she slept in the alcoves of Versailles, with their gold-embroidered hangings, have dreamed strange dreams, and wondered at times whether she was really herself. It is not surprising that Mme. de Maintenon should have regretted, at the height of her glory, the bright, gay, and unconventional home of Scarron, and the days when she made up for the lack of roast by telling a story; for Scarron was not so difficult to move to laughter as Louis XIV, of whom she said that she was getting tired at last of trying to divert a man who could no longer be diverted. In that royal home, which was growing more and more sombre, entered then black-gowned men, confessors prowled around, and the Edict of Nantes, the dragonnades of the Cevennes, the Chamillard ministry were being slowly prepared and organised. On what did all this depend? On a few pistoles; on a little more or a little less rheumatism. Cromwell did not board the vessel which was to carry him away to Jamaica for want of a pair of boots. If the stern Puritan had possessed those boots, Charles I would have kept his head on his shoulders. If Mme. Scarron had returned to America, Louis XIV would probably have continued to indulge in ballets, carousals, and love affairs; the deadly dulness of the later years of his reign would not have brought about the prolonged debauch of the Regency and the orgies of Louis XV, when the nobility indulged in such excesses that the Revolution became absolutely indispensable as a reaction and an adjustment. It takes so little to sway and turn from its course at its source a whole stream of events.

When the marriage settlements were drawn up, the notary asked Scarron what he acknowledged to have been the fortune brought by his future wife. "Two great, very self-willed eyes, a very handsome figure, a pair of beautiful hands, and a very great deal of talent,"

---

he replied. "What dower do you settle on her?" added the notary. "Immortality," continued the poet; "the names of kings' wives die with them, that of Scarron's wife will live forever."

Madame Scarron introduced into her husband's home order, seemliness, and if not quiet, decency at least, and a more respectable playfulness. She transformed the doleful home of the sick old bachelor, where vials of medicine stood cheek by jowl with bottles of wine; and if the company was as numerous as it was before, it was at least more choice and more reserved. Through her gentle influence Scarron, who was very cynical and Rabelaisian in his freedom of speech, cured himself of his filthy jokes and equivocal remarks. In all he wrote after his marriage, one notes pleasantries in better taste and a diminution of coarseness, and especially of obscenity. It must not be believed, however, that our burlesque poet was completely reformed; such marked originality as his could not repress itself to such an extent. He allowed himself a good deal of license still, and carried out the programme which he had laid out when he was married: "I shall never behave improperly to my wife, but I shall often tell her very improper things."

Well, that little, deformed, sick, ridiculous man avoided the misfortune which the greatest men, the brightest geniuses have not always managed to escape. His wife, beautiful, young, witty, courted by the most gallant, the most illustrious, and the wealthiest men of the day, remained strictly faithful to him ; a fact which no one has ever questioned save Giles Boileau, and which was acknowledged by the most slanderous writers of the day, among others by Sorbière. While so many young, loving, charming husbands are betrayed in favour of pot-bellies or asses, Scarron, the carved mandragora, escaped that which made Molière's life unhappy. The author of " Virgil Travestied " deserves to have it said that he did not take undue advantage of his conjugal rights and did not deceive himself in this respect.

Scarron was in rather easy circumstances at this time. He had, with the protection of Fouquet, the Director-General of Finances, organised a sort of surety company for carriages which reached the city gates, and which he then had driven to their destination in the city by trusty agents who became responsible for the duties. This business brought him in about six thousand livres a year. Besides his tales and his comic poems, Scarron wrote for the stage and composed several plays which brought him in a good deal of money. "Jodelet, Master and Valet" was performed in 1645. The subject is drawn from a Spanish play by Don Francesco de Rojas, called "Don Juan Alvaredo." In the same year "Jodelet the Duellist" was produced at the Hôtel de Bourgogne, under the title of "The Three Dorotheas," and appeared in book form under its present title only in 1651. "The Whims of Captain Hector," drawn from the "Miles Gloriosus" of Plautus, was performed in 1646, — for Scarron was endowed with extraordinary facility. It was remarkable for being written in octosyllabic verse on one rime. The assonance chosen by the poet is ment. "The Ridiculous Heir, or the Interested Lady" appeared in 1649. This play so greatly delighted King Louis XIV that he had it performed, it is said, three times in one day. We have read it, and confess that a single performance would more than satisfy us. The vile, odious character of Donna Helena, the interested lady, the boastfulness and the bulls of Filipin the valet, — whom his master disguises as Don Pedro de Buffalos in order to test the interested lady, who does not fail to think him delightful, believing him the owner of all the mines of Peru, — all this spiced with artless remarks by Carmagnole the lackey, does not seem to us to deserve such enthusiasm. It may be, of course, that the anecdote is apocryphal.

If ever a man found a fortunate and convenient subject, it is that of "Don Japhet of Armenia," one of Scarron's finest plays. Don Japhet thus presents himself and states who he is: —

"For me, I am Don Japhet, of Noah the grandson ;
Of Armenia is my name, by a previous order
Left before his death by that famous patriarch ;
For in Armenia it was that on the mount rested the ark."

Two of the doorkeepers were crushed to death at the performance of "Don Japhet," so great was the crowd. The first performance took place in 1663. Condensed into three acts with intermissions of song and dance, "Don Japhet" was played on May 10, 1721, before King Louis XV on the stage of the Salle des Machines in the Tuileries. The Turkish ambassador, Mehemet Effendi, was present. It was on the stage of the Marais that "The Scholar of Salamanca" was given in 1634. This is the first play in which Crispin appears. The same subject was treated simultaneously by Thomas Corneille and Boisrobert. The latter's play was performed at the Hôtel de Bourgogne that same year, and it is likely that he took advantage of Scarron having read his own play to friends from the manuscript, as was his habit, to work up as quickly as he could a tragi-comedy based on the same plot. We shall not dwell upon "The Corsair Prince," "The False Appearances" and a few other comedies, of which fragments alone have been published, but shall give, to acquaint our readers with Scarron's style, a summary of "Jodelet."

Don Juan Alvaredo arrives in Madrid by night, and is so eager to conclude his marriage with Donna Isabella, the daughter of Don Fernando, that before putting up at any inn, or taking time to eat or drink, he insists on going to the house of his future father-in-law, in spite of the wise remonstrances of his lackey Jodelet, who would dearly love to have a bite, and thinks it is very absurd to wake up people and to go hunting through a city for a house that you do not know. Don Juan is madly in love with Isabella, though he has seen her portrait only. He has sent her his own, the work of a Flemish painter, believing that it will produce the same effect on her. Jodelet does not seem quite so sure as Don Juan on this point. He has a very good reason for it, namely that, being the incarnation of absent-mindedness, he has sent off, instead of the medallion containing his master's portrait, his own ugly mug, which the Flemish painter, an easy-going fellow, had been good enough to paint into the bargain. On his confessing this, his lordship Alvaredo enters into a great rage. "What will Isabella have thought?" cries the despairing lover. "She will have said that you are not handsome," replies Jodelet, with the most aggravating coolness. Finally Don Juan cools down somewhat, and, while trying to find the house of Don Fernando de Rojas, he relates that on his returning from Flanders to Burgos he found that his brother had been killed in a duel and his sister Lucretia carried off, though he knows neither by whom nor how. As they proceed in the darkness Jodelet knocks up against a fellow whom he questions, and who tells them that the house in front of which they are is the residence of Don Fernando de Rojas. While this conversation is going on, a man climbs down from the balcony and nearly drives the travellers' sombreros down over their eyes with his foot. He calls for Stephen, and seeing that it is Jodelet who replies, he flees, not before he has exchanged a few futile passes in the darkness with Don Juan Alvaredo.

“Is it the custom in Madrid to make use of windows as doors?” asks Jodelet of his master, who, very much upset and abashed, begins to have a poor opinion of Isabella’s virtue. In order to find out the actual state of affairs, he proposes that Jodelet shall wear his dress and play in Don Fernando’s house the part of his master, a plan which the mistake made in the sending of the portraits renders the more feasible. Thanks to this disguise, Don Juan Alvaredo learns that Don Louis, the man whom he saw coming down from the balcony, had seduced Lucretia and killed his brother. Lucretia, by a romantic chance, happened to seek refuge with Donna Isabella. Don Louis atones for his wrongs and restores honour to her whom he had seduced; Don Juan Alvaredo marries Isabella, who has fallen in love with him, although she took him for a servant, but managed to recognise the master’s soul under the dress of the valet. As for Master Jodelet, the number of blunders, of absurdities, of amazing stupidities which he manages to commit, is beyond our power to sum up. His part is unquestionably one of the most naturally buffoon that exists. It was written for a very talented actor, called Julien Geoffrin, whose stage name was Jodelet and who played all the Jodelet parts. This actor entered the troupe of the Hôtel de Bourgogne by order of the king. He it was who played the part of Don Japhet of Armenia and who contributed greatly to the success of Scarron's plays.

These plays, which Scarron dashed off in three or four weeks at most, are all composed after the Spanish model, without the least regard for the rules of Aristotle. Our burlesque poet adopts the precept of Lope de Vega, which was to lock up the Precepts with six keys when one wanted to write a comedy. The scene is now in a street, now in a garden, now in a room or on a balcony. Duels, unexpected encounters, disguises, elopements, masks, dark lanterns, and rope-ladders abound; some ridiculous or stupid valet plays the part of the clown. The style, which is precious and affected in scenes of love or gallantry, is in general familiar, easy, realistic, which is the distinct mark of Scarron's manner. In most of his comedies, as was then the fashion, couplets are introduced. In the second act of "Jodelet" there is a parody of the "Cid," written in stanzas, which begins thus:—

"Be clean, my teeth, for honour wills it."

But Scarron's masterpiece is unquestionably the "Comic Romance," which is a perfect model of naturalness, of narration and originality. Nothing can be more unlike "The Illustrious Bassa," "Clelia," "The Orondates," "The Great Cyrus" and other contemporary trash. The only works which can be compared with it are the Spanish Picaresque novels, among which are included "Lazarillo de Tormés," "Gusman d'Alfarache," "El Diablo Cojuelo" and a good many more.

The action of the "Comic Romance" occurs in the neighbourhood of Mans, which Scarron had visited and which he describes with the accuracy and skill of a man who paints from nature. The characters are no less cleverly drawn than the places. We seem to witness the misadventures which befall Ragotin, so accurate is the detail, so true the gesture, so clearly is the scene indicated. The characters of La Rancune, the comedian, of Ragotin, the lawyer, have become typical; le Destin, Mademoiselle de l'Estoile, and Mademoiselle Lacaverne live in all minds. Even the stout Bouvillon has the stamp of reality so firmly impressed that we seem to have known her. Besides, the prose is excellent, free, and rapid, irresistible in its gaiety, lending itself admirably to the familiar style, and, although more inclined to be comic, not lacking a certain tender grace and poetic feeling in the amorous and romantic passages. Mademoiselle de l'Estoile is a charming figure, a delightful incarnation of poesy. Which of us, in imagination at least, has not followed as did le Destin along the rutty roads of Mans, some Mademoiselle de l'Estoile upon the play-actors' mud-bespattered cart? Is it not the old story of youth and its illusions?

The first part of "The Comic Romance" is dedicated to Cardinal de Retz, coadjutor-archbishop of Paris, who was a friend of Scarron and who visited him frequently; the second to the wife of the Director-General of Finances, with whom Madame Scarron was on a footing of friendship, as may be seen from a passage in a letter of Scarron to Marshal d'Albret: "Madame Scarron went to Saint-Mandé to visit Madame d'Emmeri, and I find that she is so smitten with her charms that I fear there may be some impure motive; but as she never goes there save when taken by friends, not having a carriage of her own, she cannot pay her court as often as she would wish." The success of "The Comic Romance" was so great that La Fontaine did not disdain to write a comedy on the adventures of La Rancune. As a general rule, in this play he has merely versified Scarron's prose. "The Comic Romance" contains also many very pleasant tales imitated or translated from the Spanish. Besides these, Scarron has written some others drawn from the collection of Donna Maria de Layas, called "Novelas Ejemplares." "The Punishment of Avarice," as one might say, is an interlinear translation of "El Castigo de la Miseria." And this was not — far from it — the only time that our burlesque poet borrowed from Spanish literature.

A single volume would not suffice to name all the plays and miscellaneous verse of Scarron, — sonnets, epithalamia, requests, New Year addresses, epistles, rondeaus, burlesque odes, drinking songs. Unable to walk and not having much other distraction, he wrote almost incessantly. When it is remembered that he possessed great facility, it will be easily understood that his collected works are very considerable. The two "Legends of Bourbon," the "Farewell to the Marais," "The Fair of Saint-Germain," "Hero and Leander," the "Petitions to the Queen," the "Epistles to the Countess of Fieschi," the "Letter to His Friend Sarrazin," in trisyllabic verse, his "Sonnet on Paris," and two or three others in which the poetic emphasis is often wittily quizzed, are most read and most frequently quoted.

Scarron's life was, in some sort, nothing more than a truce between life and death, which might be broken any day. Every year, in spite of the help of medical art and the care taken of him by Quenault and by his wife, his sufferings increased in such fashion as to give him plainly to understand that his end was approaching. His great trouble was that he would leave penniless a young, beautiful, and honest wife, whom he tenderly loved. The Court was then preparing to travel to Guyenne for the marriage of Louis XIV, and the departure of his friends saddened him still more. One day he was seized with such a violent fit of hiccoughs that it was believed that he was dying. In the very short moments of respite between the convulsions, he said, "If I ever recover from this, I shall write a fine satire against hiccoughs." He was unable to fulfil his promise, for he soon fell ill again, and seeing around his bed his household bathed in tears, "My friends," he said, "you will never weep as much for me as I have made you laugh."

He died in 1660, being then fifty, some say in the month of June, others in the month of October. A passage in Loret's "Historical Muse," of October 16 of that year, seems to strengthen the latter belief:

PAUL SCARRON

"Scarron, that playful wit
Who has at times praised me,
Scarron, the creator of burlesque,
And who in that jargon so grotesque
Surpassed for more than sixteen years
The most entertaining writers,
Has seen himself cut down by the scythe
That cuts all down.
He who lived on verse alone
Now is eaten by worms.
He sprang from a good family,
He leaves neither son nor daughter,
But does leave an amiable wife
Most worthy of affection,
For she is young, charming, and fair,
And most witty in every way."

Scarron was buried in Saint-Gervais, where, unless we are mistaken, his tomb is still to be seen. Madame Scarron was left alone, but not unprotected. The pension which her husband had received, and which amounted to five hundred crowns, was continued in her favour to the amount of two thousand livres. On leaving the convent to which she had withdrawn to spend the days of her widowhood, she became acquainted with Madame de Théanges, who introduced her to Mme. de Montespan. That was the beginning of her fortune ; but it is history and does not concern us, a mere literary biographer, a humble critic seeking for pearls in the dunghill of second-rate writers. When Madame Scarron became the Marchioness of Maintenon a curious thing happened : Scarron, who had so greatly interested the court and the town was no more thought of than if he had never lived ; the flattery of the courtiers completely suppressed the comic poet. No one ventured to make the most distant allusion to “Typhon” or to “The Æneid Travestied.” Deep silence fell upon the tomb of the poor impotent, and had Madame de Maintenon not been blessed with a good memory, she might very well have forgotten that Mademoiselle d’Aubigné had married poor Scarron. The literary form which he had made popular disappeared with him. In vain did d’Assoucy, hoping to gather in the inheritance of the master, proclaim himself the Emperor of burlesque. Boileau proved stronger, and Scarron had no literary any more than he had natural descendants. It was only when the great king was well and duly buried in Saint-Denis that people dared to remember the works of the poor poet and to republish them.

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

Introduction

SPAIN has always attracted Frenchmen : whether they warred with it or were friendly to it, at least they have never been indifferent to it. The noble French epic, "The Song of Roland," is full of Saracenic Spain ; the sixteenth century borrowed the Spanish version of "Amadis of Gaul" which, in its new dress, became the breviary of the Court of the Valois ; Henry IV fought and defeated the Spaniard, but wore his costume and spoke his language ; Richelieu checkmated Spain at every point, but Corneille sang the praises of the Castilian pundonor in his immortal "Cid ;" Condé destroyed the military prestige of the dons at Rocroy, but Scarron turned to the writers of the Peninsula for inspiration, and Molière placed the Sevillian Don Juan upon the French stage. In the eighteenth century Lesage's purely French masterpiece, "Gil Blas," masqueraded under Spanish names and Spanish local colour, and it was under a Spanish veil that Beaumarchais presented his subversive comedy "The Marriage of Figaro," on the eve of the Revolution.

When the nineteenth century dawned and Romanticism arose, that school felt the Spanish attraction and yielded to it more ardently than had ever before been the case. Chateaubriand, the founder of Romanticism, wrote a picturesque and sentimental tale, "The Last of the Abencerrages," in which he brilliantly described the Alhambra and the glories of Granada, without entering into actual detail, and recalled the varied history of the land ruled in turn by Moor and by Christian. Alfred de Vigny, too, owned the spell: his "Dolorida" and "The Horn" seemed to the enthusiastic youth of his day faithful pictures of the past and the present in Old Spain. Alfred de Musset, whose reputation balanced for a time that of the sov'ran poet, made his début with "Tales of Spain and Italy," written in the richly coloured verse that alone found favour in the eyes of the men of his generation. Mérimée produced his "Drama of Clara Gazul," a collection of plays inspired by the free drama of Lope de Vega and Calderon de la Barca, which he palmed off as Spanish originals, and which he followed with tales, the scene of which was laid in the Peninsula, and later with "Letters from Spain," written while travelling through the country. Victor Hugo, the chief of the school, had already in his "Odes and Ballads" turned to the land of fiery passions and fierce hatreds for striking subjects. In his celebrated "Preface" to his drama "Cromwell," admiration for Spanish letters and modes of thought showed plainly enough. It was with a Spanish subject that he won his first triumph on the stage and overthrew for a time the Classical repertory. "Hernani" was a name to conjure by in those days, and even now, seventy years later, the echoes of the conflict it aroused have not wholly died away. It was with a Spanish subject again that in "Ruy Blas" Victor Hugo scored another success, while it is interesting to note that these are the only two plays of his that have survived the wreck of the Romanticist drama.

The Romanticist movement had been impelled towards exoticism by Chateaubriand, and the various writers of genius or talent who hastened to follow his lead sought that exoticism either in bygone times — especially in the epoch of the Renaissance and the Middle Ages — or in absolutely foreign countries.

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

Italy never seemed quite foreign enough to the enthusiasts of that excitable and emotional period in literature. It was too closely linked with classical memories to furnish — save in the bloody annals of its mediæval days — subjects startling enough to satisfy the exigencies of the Romanticists. Spain, the legendary Spain of the poet and the romancer, of Lope de Vega and Calderon, of Columbus and Cervantes, had, on the contrary, taken a strong hold on the imaginations of the writers of the new school. It combined all the elements of picturesqueness and strangeness, of violent passions and singular manners, which they craved for. It shared with Greece — the Greece of the War of Independence — and with Turkey the characteristics of Orientalism. It was, like these lands, wholly different from the France of the Restoration and the bourgeois king Louis-Philippe. Its scenery must of necessity be grander, wilder, more diversified, more striking than that of fair France, fair and gentle, but as yet scarcely known to its inhabitants, and unappreciated until George Sand drew attention to its many charms and rustic beauties. Spanish towns and cities must perforce be quainter, more mediæval, more barbaric in outline, in plan, in detail, in character, in architecture than old Paris itself, swamped in the newer city that had grown up around it. The mingling of Gothic and Moorish which they presented must of necessity be more artistic than the mingling of Gothic and Classical met with in the chief cities of the native land. The inhabitants also, from the grandee who stood with covered head in the presence of his sovereign to the poor but proud hidalgo draped in his worn and ragged mantle, must be cast in another mould than the society nobleman and the despised épiciér who appeared to the Romanticist writer to constitute the totality of French society. The accursed effects of civilisation — branded by the flaming eloquence of Rousseau in the previous century — must be almost unfelt in the Iberian land, where men might love and hate, women be passionate and jealous, lovers slay and fathers kill, without the stupid law intervening to trouble the free course of natural feeling and desire.

Spain was the land of love intrigues, of grated windows and barred balconies, of serenades and duels, of knife-thrusts and secret poisonings, of all things, in a word, that made life worth living in Romanticist literature. Its men were still clad in the picturesque costumes with which Beaumarchais had familiarised the French; its women still wore the brilliant dress in which Fanny Elssler won terpsichorean triumphs on the stage in the bolero, the fandango, and the cachucha. The sombrero and the mantilla, the fan and the navaja, the castanets and the tambourine were inseparable adjuncts of the Castilian, the Andalusian, and the Valencian — at least such was the firm belief of the whole of the long-haired Romanticist tribe. Byron's "Childe Harold" and "Don Juan" had wrought up French imaginations and inflamed French hearts. Victor Hugo, who did remember something of the country which he had seen when a boy, had added fuel to the fire with his splendid tales of Spain couched in burning verse.

And Gautier was all aglow with passionate love of that land, of its manners, its customs, its architecture, its Moorish remains, its Gothic piles, its majos and manolas. The Spain he knew was the Spain he dreamed of; the land he had learned to love and long for in the verse of his Byron and of his poetic chief, — a world of passion, a land of splendour, a country of contrasts that appealed to his every feeling as a painter, to his every instinct as a poet, to his every aspiration as a youth intoxicated with the liquor of exoticism, with the heady wine of local colour. He had scarcely travelled when, in 1840, he crossed the Bidassoa and left the Pyrenees behind him. He had seen Belgium only, and the quaintness of the architecture of that land had but whetted his appetite for more strangeness and unexpectedness. Then, too, in the Low Countries he had come upon innumerable traces and reminiscences of the Spanish domination, and he was the more keen to behold with his own eyes the land of Alva and Philip the Second and of Charles the Fifth.

It was under those influences and in that state of mind that he began, continued, and ended his travels in Spain. He sought the picturesque, the barbaric, the curious, the eccentric, and it would indeed have been strange had he not found it. What he went to look for, and what he perceived was the external appearance of the land and the people. He was not concerned with the deeper questions that might well engage the attention of an observer: he heeded neither the political troubles nor the mental unrest; he paid no attention to the conflict of dynasties nor to the aspirations towards freedom of a people long held in bondage by the Bourbon sovereigns; to the deep disturbance caused by suc-

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

cessive revolutions treading on the heels of repeated aggression and invasion by his own countrymen. The history of the century — yet young — is nowhere discussed by him, although it was in Spain that Napoleon's power had been shattered, that Wellington had crushed the French armies, that the country had risen as one man to repel the foreign foe, and had waged a war so bitter, so relentless, so hideously cruel that humanity might well have been staggered by it. At the very moment when he was revelling in the fierce emotions aroused in him by the brutalising spectacle of the bull-fight, when he was joying in the delicate, fairy-like grace of the Alhambra, with its memories of the Moor, of Chateaubriand and Washington Irving, when he was delighting in the glories of Burgos and Seville, the country was in the last throes of the Carlist war; Espartero was the popular hero, and the Queen-Regent, Christina, was abdicating the power she had so ruthlessly and so thoroughly misused, and fleeing to France. Here and there in his book, it is true, one comes upon passing allusions to the events that shook Spain to its foundations, but the only reflections they suggest to him are that vandalism is inseparable from revolutions, and that picturesqueness has lost by the expulsion of the monks in robe and cowl from the deserted monasteries he traverses.

With this reservation, which is a regret, the "Travels in Spain" form most delightful reading. It is impossible, surely, to render with greater force, vividness, and accuracy the external aspect of the land and its inhabitants; to convey more admirably in words the sense of form, the beauty of outline, the picturesqueness of detail and of costume, the splendour and variety of colour. The style of Gautier is fairly enchanting in these respects, and the reader — if he learns little or nothing of the character and modes of thought of the Spaniards, if he is not helped to an understanding of the forces at work in the country which Roman and Moor conquered and lost — enjoys at least an unparalleled word-painting of one of the most picturesque of lands, of the most interesting of countries.

The "Travels in Spain" first appeared in the shape of letters to the Paris journal La Presse, between May 27 and September 3, 1840, under the title Lettres d'un Feuilletoniste — Sur les Chemins. These comprised the first nine chapters. The tenth and eleventh appeared in the Revue de Paris, on January 17 and 31 and October 17, 1841, and the remaining ones in the Revue

des Deux Mondes, between April 15, 1842, and January 1, 1843. They were collected and published in book form, in two volumes, with some additions, in 1843, under the title Tra los Montes, and dedicated to Eugène Piot, who had been his travelling companion. In 1845 a new edition appeared, in which the title was changed to Voyage en Espagne, and in 1849 the original name of the work, Tra los Montes, was added as a sub-title.

I R U N

A FEW weeks since, in April, 1840, I had carelessly said, "I should rather like to go to Spain." A few days later my friends had omitted the prudent reservation which accompanied the expression of my wish, and repeated to any one that came along that I was going on a trip to Spain. So on the 5th of May I proceeded to rid my country of my importunate person, and climbed into the Bordeaux stage-coach, which took me to that city and Bayonne, where we took the Madrid coach, in which we reached the Bidassoa River.

On the other side of the Bidassoa shows Irun, the first Spanish village. Half the bridge belongs to France, half to Spain. Close to the bridge is the famous Isle of Pheasants, where was celebrated by proxy the marriage of Louis XIV.

A few more revolutions of our wheels, and I shall perhaps lose one of my illusions and see disappear the

Spain of my dreams, the Spain of the Romancero, of Victor Hugo's ballads, of Mérimée's tales and Alfred de Musset's stories. As I cross the dividing line, I remember what dear, witty Henri Heine said to me at Liszt's concert, in that German accent of his, full of humour and slyness: "How will you manage to speak of Spain after you have been there?"

One half of the Bidassoa bridge belongs to France, the other half to Spain; you can plant one foot on either kingdom, which is very grand. At the farther end of the bridge you plunge at once into Spanish life and local colour. Irun has no resemblance whatever to a French village. The roofs of the houses project in fan shape; the tiles, alternately convex and concave, form a sort of crenelation of strange and Moorish aspect; the jutting balconies are of old blacksmith's work of amazing beauty for a lonely village, and convey the idea of great wealth now vanished. The women spend their lives on these balconies, shaded by an awning in striped colours, and turn them into so many aerial chambers stuck on the face of the building. The two ends are unprotected, and give passage to the cooling breeze and to burning glances. Do not, however, look there for the dun, warm tints, the brown-meerschäum shades which a painter might hope for, — everything is whitewashed after the Arab fashion; but the contrast of the chalky tone with the dark, brown colour of the beams, the roofs, and the balconies nevertheless produces a pleasant effect.

IRUN

We parted with horses at Irun. To the coach were harnessed ten mules, clipped half way up the body, so that they were half hide, half hair, like those mediæval costumes which look like two halves of different garments that have been sewed together. These curiously clipped mules have a strange look, and appear dreadfully thin, for the denudation enables one to study their anatomy thoroughly — bones, muscles, and the smallest of the veins included. With their hairless tails and their pointed ears, they look like huge rats. Besides the ten mules, our numbers were increased by a zagal and two escopeteros, adorned with bell-mouthed muskets (trabucos). A zagal is a sort of runner or sub-mayoral, who puts the shoe on the wheels on perilous hills, looks after the harness and the springs, hurries up the relays, and plays the part of La Fontaine's fly, but much more efficaciously. He wears a charming costume — a pointed hat, adorned with velvet bands and silk tufts, and a brown or snuff-coloured jacket with cuffs and collar of different colours, usually blue, white, and red, with a great arabesque flowering in the middle of his back, breeches studded with filigree buttons, a pair of alpargatas, which are sandals fastened with cords. Add a red sash and a scarf with many coloured stripes, and you have a thoroughly correct get-up. The escopeteros are guardians (miqueletes), destined to escort the carriage and to frighten away rateros (the name given to thieves on a small scale), who would not resist the temptation of spoiling a single traveller, but whom the terrifying sight of a trabuco suffices to stand off, and who pass by saluting you with the regulation, Vaya V. con Dios, "Go, and God be with you." The dress of the escopeteros is very similar to that of the zagal, but less coquettish and less rich. They sit on top at the back of the carriage and thus overlook the whole country. In describing our caravan we forgot to mention a little postilion, who rides on a horse, keeps ahead of the train, and starts the whole line.

A strange, inexplicable, harsh, terrifying, and laughter-provoking noise had been filling my ear for some time. I fancied it must be, at the very least, some princess being murdered by a ferocious necromancer. It was nothing more than an ox-cart ascending the street of Irun; its wheels shrieking hideously for lack of grease, the driver preferring, no doubt, to put the said grease into his soup. The cart was in every respect exceedingly primitive. The wheels were solid blocks and turned with the axle, as in the little carts made by children from the shell of a pumpkin. The noise is heard over a mile away, and is not considered unpleasant by the natives. It provides them with a musical instrument which plays automatically as long as the wheel lasts. A peasant here would not have a cart that did not shriek. This particular one must have been constructed at the time of the flood.

As the hill is steep I walked as far as the town gate, and turning around I cast a farewell glance on France. The prospect was truly magnificent. The chain of the Pyrenees sank in harmonious undulations towards the blue surface of the sea, cut here and there by silvery bars; and, thanks to the extreme clearness of the atmosphere, I could perceive very far away a faint, pale, salmon-coloured line which projected into the vast azure, and formed a great bight on the edge of the coast. Bayonne and its outpost, Biarritz, formed the extremity of this point, and the Gulf of

Gascony stood out as plainly as on a map. From now on, we shall not again approach the sea until we are in Andalusia. Farewell, good old Ocean!

The carriage galloped at full speed up and down extremely steep hills, — a performance which can be carried out only thanks to the marvellous skill of the drivers and the extraordinary surefootedness of the mules. In spite of our speed, there fell in our laps from time to time a laurel branch, a little bouquet of wild flowers, a string of mountain strawberries like rosy pearls threaded on a blade of grass. These bouquets were thrown by the little beggar boys and girls, who followed the coach, running barefooted over the sharp stones. This fashion of asking for alms by first making a gift one's self has something noble and poetic about it.

The landscape was delightful, somewhat Swiss in appearance, perhaps, but of very varied aspect. Mountainous masses, in the intervals of which one caught sight of still higher ridges, rose up on either side of the way. Their slopes, diversified with various crops, wooded with green oaks, set off admirably the distant vaporous summits. Red-roofed villages blossomed at the foot of the mountains amid clumps of trees, and every minute I expected to see Kettle or Gretle issue from these new chalets. Happily, Spain does not carry comic opera quite so far.

Torrents as capricious as women come and go, form little cascades, part, meet again, thread the rocks and the pebbles in the most diverting fashion, and afford a pretext for an endless number of the most picturesque bridges. These bridges have a peculiar appearance: the arches are cut out almost up to the railing, so that the road on which the coach drives seems not to be more than six inches thick. A sort of triangular pier, performing the office of a bastion, is usually found in the centre. The profession of Spanish bridge is not a very fatiguing one. There can scarcely be a more perfect sinecure; you can walk under Spanish bridges during nine months in the year. They stay in their places with imperturbable indifference and a patience worthy of a better fate, awaiting a river, a thread of water, or even a little dampness; for they are well aware that their arches are mere arcades, and their name utter flattery. The torrents of which I spoke just now have at most a depth of four or five inches of water, but they suffice to make a good deal of noise and to impart life to the solitudes which they traverse. From time to time they drive some mill-wheel, or feed some works by means of a dam, built in just the place for a landscape painter.

The houses scattered in small groups through the land are of a strange colour, — neither black, nor white, nor yellow, but the colour of roast turkey. This definition, however trivial and culinary it may sound, is none the less absolutely correct. Clumps of trees and patches of green oaks bring out admirably the gray lines and the vaporous, sombre tints of the mountains. We dwell purposely on these trees because nothing is rarer in Spain, and henceforth we shall have but scant opportunity to describe them.

We changed mules at Oyarzun, and at nightfall reached the village of Astigarraga, where we were to sleep. We had not yet had any experience of the Spanish inn; and the picaresque and lively descriptions in Don Quixote and Lazarillo de Tormes coming back to our memory, our whole body itched at the mere thought of them. We expected omelets adorned with hair as long as that of the Merovingian kings, mixed with feathers and claws; pieces of stale bacon with all the bristles left on, thus equally suitable to make soup out of or to black pots with; wine in goat-skins like those which the good knight of La Mancha slashed so furiously — and we even expected nothing at all, which is much worse.

Profiting by the little daylight which remained, we went to visit the church, which in truth looked more like a fortress than a temple. The small windows cut like loopholes, the thick walls, the solid buttresses, imparted to it a robust, square look more warlike than meditative. Spanish churches often have that appearance. Around it ran a sort of open cloister, in which was suspended a very large bell, which was rung by moving the striker with a rope instead of swinging the enormous metal capsule.

When we were shown to our rooms we were dazzled with the whiteness of the bed and window-curtains, the Dutch cleanliness of the floor, and the perfect neatness of every detail. Tall, handsome, well-made girls, with their splendid tresses flowing down their backs, very well-dressed and in no wise resembling the promised sluts, came and went with an activity that augured well for the supper, which was not long in coming. It was excellent and very well served. At the risk of being tedious, we shall describe it; for the difference between one people and another lies precisely in these small details, which travellers neglect in favour of grave poetical or political views, which can very well be written without one's going to the country itself.

A rich soup was first served, differing from ours in having a reddish colour due to saffron which is dusted on it to give it a tone. There surely is local colour—red soup. The bread is very white and close, with a slightly golden crust; it is salted sufficiently to be quite noticeable to a Parisian palate. The forks have the end of the handle turned back, the prongs flat and cut like the teeth of a comb. The spoons also have a spatula look which our silver-ware has not. The cloth is a sort of coarse damask. As for the wine, we must confess that it was of the richest possible episcopal violet and thick enough to be cut with a knife, while the carafes in which it was contained did not make it at all transparent.

After the soup, was served the puchero, an eminently Spanish dish, or rather, the sole Spanish dish, for it is eaten every day from Irun to Cadiz and from Cadiz to Irun. A proper puchero is composed of a quarter of beef, a piece of mutton, a chicken, a few ends of a sausage called chorizo, stuffed full of pepper, pimento, and other spices, of slices of bacon and ham, and on top of all, a hot tomato and saffron sauce; so far the animal portion. The vegetable portion, called verdura, varies according to the season, but cabbage and garbanzo always form the basis of it. The garbanzo is scarcely known in Paris, and we cannot define it better than by saying that it is a pea that has striven to become a bean and has succeeded too well. All this stuff is served on different dishes, but the various ingredients are mixed on one's plate in a way to produce a very complicated and tasty mayonnaise. This mixture will doubtless appear somewhat barbarous to gourmets, nevertheless it has a charm of its own and is bound to please eclectics and pantheists. Afterwards came chickens dressed with oil,—for butter is unknown in Spain,—fried fish, either trout or stock-fish, roast lamb, asparagus, salad, and if desired, macaroons, broiled almonds of exquisite taste, goat's-milk cheese, queso de Burgos, which is very famous and sometimes deserves to be. To wind up, a tray is brought in with Malaga wine, sherry, brandy, aguardiente (which resembles our French anisette), and a small cup (fuego) filled with live coals to light your cigarette. This meal, with a few unimportant changes, is invariably reproduced in every part of Spain.

IRUN

We left Astigarraga at midnight, and passed through Ernani, the name of which calls up the most romantic remembrances, without catching sight of anything but huddled hovels and broken-down buildings vaguely perceived through the darkness. We traversed, without stopping, Tolosa, where we noticed houses adorned with frescoes and huge coats of arms carved in stone. It was market day, and the market place was full of asses, mules picturesquely harnessed, and peasants with strange and fierce faces. By dint of climbing and descending, crossing torrents upon dry stone bridges, we at last reached Vergara, where we were to dine.

VERGARA — BURGOS

A<sup>T</sup> Vergara, I saw my first Spanish priest. His appearance struck me as rather grotesque, although, thank Heaven! I do not entertain Voltaire's ideas with regard to the clergy; but the caricature of Beaumarchais' Basile involuntarily recurred to me. Imagine a black cassock with a cloak of similar colour, and over all a vast, prodigious, phenomenal, hyperbolic, titanic hat, of which no epithet, however extravagant and excessive it may be, can give even the faintest approximate idea. The hat is at least three feet long, the brim is curved inwards, and makes in front and behind the head a sort of horizontal roof. It is difficult to invent a more absurd and fantastic shape. It did not on the whole prevent the worthy priest from looking very respectable, and walking about with the air of a man whose conscience is perfectly easy as regards the shape of his headgear. In place of bands he wore a small white and blue collar, alzacuello, like the Belgian priests.

Beyond Mondragon, which is, as they say in Spain, the last pueblo of the province of Guipuscoa, we entered the province of Alava, and were soon at the foot of the Salinas mountain. Switchback railways are nothing in comparison with it, and at first the idea that the coach is going to cross it strikes one as being as ridiculous as walking on the ceiling head down, as flies do. The miracle was performed with the help of six oxen, which were harnessed ahead of the ten mules. Never in my life have I heard such an uproar. The mayoral, the zagal, the escopeteros, the postilion, and the oxen-drivers vied with each other in shouts, invectives, whip-lashings, and blows of the goad; they pushed at the spokes of the wheels; they steadied the coach from behind, dragged the mules by the bridle, the oxen by the horns, with incredible ardour and fury. The coach, at the tail end of that long line of animals and men, presented the most curious appearance. There must have been fully fifty yards between the leaders and the wheelers of the team. Let us not forget, by the way, the church steeple of Salinas, which has a pleasant Saracenic aspect.

Looking back from the top of the mountain, the various elevations of the chain of the Pyrenees are seen stretched out in infinite perspective. They look like great light velvet draperies cast here and there and rumpled into quaint folds by a Titan's caprice. At Royave, a little farther on, I noticed an exquisite effect of light. A snowy summit (sierra nevada), which the nearer crests of the mountains had until then concealed from us, suddenly appeared, standing out against a sky of so deep a lapis-lazuli blue that it was almost black. Soon on every side of the plateau which we were traversing, other mountains raised their snow-covered, cloud-capped heads. The snow was not compact, but divided into thin threads like the ribbing of silver gauze, its whiteness increased by contrast with the azure or lilac tints of the rock faces. The cold was rather sharp, and grew more intense as we advanced. The wind had not got very warm while caressing the pale cheeks of those handsome, chilly virgins, and it reached us as icy as if it had come in a straight line from the arctic or antarctic poles.

The sun was setting when we entered Vitoria. After traversing all sorts of streets, the architecture of which was mediocre and in poor taste, the carriage stopped at the Parador Viejo. Crossing a fairly handsome square surrounded by arcades, we went straight to the church. Darkness already filled the nave and thickened mysteriously and threateningly in obscure corners, in which could be dimly made out fantastic shapes. A few small lamps twinkled darkly yellow and smoky, like stars through a fog. It was in this Vitoria church that I first met with those terrifying carvings in coloured wood which the Spanish indulge in so excessively.

---

After a supper (cena) which made us regret the one we had enjoyed at Astigarraga, we bethought ourselves of going to the theatre. We had been lured by a poster announcing an extraordinary performance by the French Hercules, followed by a baile nacional, which appeared to us big with cachucas, boleros, fandangos, and other wild dances.

Play-houses in Spain, have, as a rule, no façade, and are distinguished from other buildings merely by two or three smoky lamps hung at the door. We took two orchestra stalls called glass seats (asientos de luneta), and we plunged bravely into a passage the flooring of which was neither boarded nor tiled, but the bare ground. The interior of the theatre is more comfortable than the approach would indicate; the boxes are very well arranged, and though the decoration is simple, it is fresh and clean. The asientos de luneta are armchairs arranged in rows and numbered. There is no ticket-taker at the door to take your tickets, but a small boy collects them before the close of the performance. At the entrance you have merely to deliver an admission ticket.

We hoped to find here the Spanish feminine type, of which so far we had seen very few specimens. However, the women who filled the boxes and the balconies had nothing Spanish about them save the mantilla and the fan. It was a good deal, but it was not enough. The audience was composed mainly of military men, as is the case in garrison towns. The spectators in the pit stand up, as in primitive theatres. The orchestra, composed of a single row of musicians, most of them playing upon brass instruments, blew courageously upon their cornets à piston an unvarying refrain which recalled the trumpet-call at Franconi's circus.

Try to understand, gentle reader, the eager impatience of two young, enthusiastic, and romantic Frenchmen who are going to see for the first time a Spanish dance in Spain.

At last the curtain rose upon a stage setting which had the intention, not carried out, of being enchanting and fairy-like; the cornets à piston blew forth with greater fury the above-mentioned blast, and the baile nacional came forward in the persons of a male and a female dancer, both of them armed with castanets. Never have I seen anything sadder and more lamentable. No twopenny theatre has ever borne upon its worm-eaten boards a more worn out, tired out, toothless pair, a more complete pair of wrecks. The poor woman, who had plastered herself over with inferior powder, had a sky-blue tint which recalled to the imagination the delightful image of a person who has died of cholera, or of a drowned man who has been too long out of the water. As for the man, he darkly hopped up and down in his corner; he rose and fell loosely like a bat which is crawling on its feet; he looked like a grave-digger engaged in burying himself. If instead of castanets he had held a Gothic rebec, he could have passed for the coryphæus in the fresco of the Dance of Death at Basle. As long as the dance lasted they never once looked at each other; they seemed afraid to behold each other's ugliness, and to burst into tears on seeing themselves so old, so decrepit, and so deathly-looking.

---

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

---

This bolero of death lasted five or six minutes, at the end of which the curtain fell, putting an end to the torture of these two wretches and to our own. That is how the bolero struck two poor travellers in love with local colour. Spanish dances exist in Paris alone, just as sea-shells are to be found in curiosity shops only, and never upon the seashore.

We went to bed pretty well disappointed. In the middle of the night we were called up, for we had to start again. The cold was still bitter, a regular Siberian temperature, due to the elevation of the plateau we were traversing and the snows by which we were surrounded.

At Miranda we entered old Castile (Castilla la Vieja) in the kingdom of Castile and Leon, symbolised by a lion holding a shield semé of castles. These lions, which are repeated until you are sick of them, are usually of gray granite, and have an imposing heraldic port. Between Ameyugo and Cubo, small, insignificant villages where we changed mules, the landscape is extremely picturesque. The mountains draw nearer and closer, and huge, perpendicular rocks rise on the edge of the road steep as cliffs. On the left a torrent, crossed by a bridge with truncated ogee arch, roars at the foot of a ravine, drives a mill, and covers with foam the stones which block its way; and in order that nothing shall be wanting to make the picture effective, a Gothic church falling in ruins, its roof broken in, its walls covered with parasitic plants, rises amid the rocks. In the background the Sierra shows faint and blue. The prospect is undoubtedly beautiful, but the Pancorvo defile is superior in its startling grandeur. The cliffs leave barely room for the road, and a point is reached where two huge masses of granite incline toward each other, representing the arch of a gigantic bridge, cut in the centre to stop the passage of an army of Titans. A second similar arch within the thickness of the rock increases the illusion. Never did a scene painter imagine a more picturesque and better arranged scene. After the flat prospects of the plains, the surprising effects met with at every step in the mountains seem impossible and fabulous.

The posada where we stopped for dinner had a stable for a hallway. This arrangement is invariably to be met with in every Spanish posada, and in order to reach your room you have to walk behind the heels of the mules. The wine, which was blacker than usual, had in addition a pretty local bouquet, derived from the goatskin. The maids of the inn wore their hair hanging down their backs; with this exception their costume was that of French women of the lower classes. As a general rule the national costume has been preserved in Andalusia only; in Castile you come upon very few examples of it. The men all wear pointed hats trimmed with velvet or silk tufts, or else wolfskin caps, rather ferocious in shape, and the inevitable snuff-coloured or black cloaks. For the rest, there is nothing very characteristic about their dress.

Between Pancorvo and Burgos we came upon three or four little villages as dry as pumice stone and of the colour of dust. I doubt whether Descamps ever found in Asia Minor any walls more burnt, more browned, more tanned, more grainy, more crisp, more scorched than these. Along these walls loll asses at least as good as the Turkish donkeys, and which he ought to come to study. The Turkish donkey is a fatalist, and you can see by his humble and dreamy look that he is resigned to the blows which fate has in reserve for him, and which he will submit to without complaint. The Castilian donkey has a more philosophical and deliberate look; he understands that man cannot do without him; he is one of the household; he has read Don Quixote, and he boasts of descending in a direct line from Sancho Panza's famous steed. Side by side with the donkeys, moon thorough-bred dogs of a superb breed, with fine nails, strong legs, backs, and heads ; among others, great greyhounds, after the style of those of Veronese or Velasquez, of great size and beauty ; and a few dozen muchachos, or street boys, whose eyes sparkle amid their rags like black diamonds.

Old Castile is no doubt so called on account of the great number of old women one meets in it, — and such old women ! Macbeth's witches traversing the heath of Dunsinane to prepare their infernal stew are charming girls by comparison with them. The abominable vixens in Goya's "Caprices," which I had believed to be nightmares and chimeras, are frightfully accurate portraits. Most of these women are as hairy as mouldy cheese and have moustaches like grenadiers. Then their dress is a sight. If you were to take a piece of stuff and spend ten years in dirtying it, scraping it, making holes in it, and patching it, until it lost its original colour, you would not attain to the sublimity of these rags. These charms are increased by a haggard, fierce aspect very different from the humble and piteous mien of the poor people in France.

VERGARA—BURGOS

Shortly before we reached Burgos a great building on the hill was pointed out to us. It was the Carthusian monastery (Cartuja de Miraflores). Shortly afterwards the tracery of the cathedral spires, which became every moment more distinct, showed against the sky, and half an hour later we entered the famous capital of Old Castile.

The main square of Burgos, in the centre of which rises an indifferent bronze statue of Charles III, is large and rather striking in appearance. Red houses, upborne by pillars of bluish granite, enclose it on all sides. Under the arcades and on the square itself all sorts of small dealers are found, and an infinite number of picturesque asses, mules, and peasants are wandering around. Castilian rags show here in all their splendour; the meanest mendicant is aristocratically draped in his mantle like a Roman emperor in the purple. I cannot find a better comparison for these mantles, both as regards their colour and the stuff itself, than great pieces of tinder with ragged edges. Don Cæsar de Bazan's cloak, in the play of "Ruy Blas," does not approach these triumphant and glorious rags. The whole business is so dry, worn, and inflammable that you cannot help thinking the wearers imprudent when they smoke and strike their flint and steel. The children of six or eight years of age also have their cloaks, which they wear with most amusing gravity.

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

The fonda where we alighted was a regular Spanish inn, where no one understood a word of French; so we had to trot out our Spanish, but I am bound to say that, thanks to the remarkable intelligence which is characteristic of these people, we were fairly well understood.

The service of the inn was performed by a troop of wild-haired kitchen wenches, bearing the finest names in the world,—Casilda, Matilda, Balbina. Names are always beautiful in Spain; Lola, Bibiana, Pepa, Hilaria, Carmen, Cipriana are tacked on to the most prosaic creatures. One of the maids had hair of a most vehement red, a very frequent colour in Spain, where, contrary to the general belief, there are many fair, and especially many red-haired women.

There are no bolsters to the beds, but two flat pillows placed one on top of the other. These are usually very hard, although the material is good, but it is not customary to card the wool of the mattresses; it is merely turned over with a couple of sticks.

VERGARA—BURGOS

Although Burgos has been so long the first city of Castile, it has not preserved a very marked Gothic appearance. With the exception of one street in which are to be seen a few windows and porticoes, of the time of the Renaissance, surmounted by coats of arms with supporters, the buildings do not date much beyond the beginning of the seventeenth century and are exceedingly vulgar-looking; they are old-fashioned, and yet they are not old. But Burgos has its cathedral, which is one of the finest in the world. Unfortunately, like all Gothic cathedrals, it is set in the midst of numerous buildings which prevent your having a general view and grasping its vast proportions.

The great portal opens upon a square, in the centre of which rises a pretty fountain, surmounted by a charming Christ, in white marble, — the butt of all the little gamins in the city, whose greatest enjoyment is to throw stones at statues. The portal, which is magnificent embroidered work, deep cut and flowery as a piece of lace, has been unfortunately scraped and planed up to the first frieze by some Italian prelates — great lovers of simple architecture, sober walls, and ornaments in good taste — who desired to give the cathedral a Roman look, greatly pitying, as they did, the poor barbarians who did not make much use of the Corinthian order and who did not seem to be aware of the beauties of the attic and the triangular pediment. There are still many people of the same opinion in Spain; just as was the case in France before the Romantic school caused the Middle Ages to be held in honour and the meaning and beauty of the cathedrals to be understood.

---

Two slender spires, crocketed all the way up, with much open work, festooned and embroidered, carved even in their smallest details like the setting of a ring, spring heavenward with all the ardour of faith and all the rush of firmest conviction. Our incredulous campaniles would not dare to venture into the skies with no better support than lace of stone and ribs as delicate as cobweb-threads. Another tower, also carved with incredible richness, but less lofty, marks the intersection of the arms of the cross and completes the magnificence of the outline.

A goodly fellowship of statues of saints, archangels, kings, and monks animates the design, and this population in stone is so numerous, so closely pressed, it swarms so amazingly, that unquestionably it is larger than the living population which inhabits the town.

VERGARA—BURGOS

As one steps into the church an incomparable masterpiece compels you to stop : it is the carved wooden door which opens into the cloister. It represents, among other subjects in bas-relief, Christ's entrance into Jerusalem. The jambs and transoms are covered with exquisite figures of the most elegant appearance, and so marvellously carved that it is hard to understand how inert and opaque material like wood can yield to such a capricious and clever fancy. It is undoubtedly the finest gate in the world next to Ghiberti's in the Baptistery at Florence, which Michael Angelo, who was a connoisseur, considered worthy of being the gate of Paradise. This admirable work should be moulded and cast in bronze to secure it such eternity as is at man's command.

The choir, the stalls in which are called sillaria, is closed by wrought-iron gates of wonderful hammered work. The flooring is covered, as usual in Spain, with immense esparto mats ; each stall has, in addition, its own little dried grass or reed carpet. Above is a sort of dome, formed by the interior of the tower already spoken of. It is a mass of sculptured arabesques, statues, little columns, groining, lancets, pendentives, which make you giddy. It would take more than two years to note every detail. The work is as close pressed as the leaves of a cabbage, open-worked like a fish-knife, gigantic as a pyramid, delicate as an earring; and how this filigree has kept up in mid-air for centuries is past understanding. What kind of men were they who erected these marvellous buildings, which the prodigality of fairy palaces cannot surpass? Has the breed died out? And are we, who boast of being civilised, nothing but decadent barbarians after all? I am filled with a deep sadness when I visit one of these mighty buildings of past days; I am utterly cast down and only care to withdraw into a corner, to put a stone under my head, and to await in motionless contemplation death, which is absolute stillness.

If you will go around with us in this vast madre-pore, built by the prodigious human polypus of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, we shall begin with the small sacristy, which is a fairly large hall, in spite of its name, and which contains an Ecce Homo, a Christ on the Cross by Murillo, and a Nativity by Jordaens, the latter framed in exquisitely carved wood-work. In the centre is placed a large brasero, which is used to light the censers, and perhaps the cigarettes also, for a great many Spanish priests smoke. The brasero is a great brass basin placed upon a tripod, and filled with charcoal or small fruit-stones lighted and covered with fine ashes, which produce a gentle fire. The brasero in Spain takes the place of chimneys, which are very rare.

In the great sacristy, near the smaller one, there is a Christ on the Cross by Domenico Theotokopouli, called el Greco, an extravagant and erratic painter, whose work might be mistaken for sketches by Titian, did not a certain affectation of sharp, carelessly painted forms betray him very quickly. In order to give his paintings the appearance of being very boldly painted, he has daubed here and there, with incredible petulance and brutality, thin, sharp lights, which traverse the shadows like sword-cuts. All the same, el Greco is a great painter ; the good works in his second manner resemble Romanticist paintings by Eugène Delacroix.

You have no doubt seen in the Spanish gallery at Paris the portrait of el Greco's daughter, a magnificent head which no master would refuse to sign. You can see from that what an admirable painter Domenico Theotokopouli could be when he was in his right mind. It appears that his anxiety to avoid resembling Titian, whose pupil he was, turned his head and led him into extravagances and fantasies which allowed his splendid gifts to show only in intermittent gleams. El Greco was, besides, an architect and a sculptor, a sublime trinity, a luminous triangle, which is often met with in the heaven of highest art.

The sacristy is panelled with cupboards, with flowered and festooned columns in the richest taste. Above the panelling there is a row of Venetian mirrors, the use of which I do not well understand, unless they are placed there merely as ornaments, for they are too high up to allow one to look into them. Above the mirrors are ranged in chronological order the portraits of all the bishops of Burgos, from the first one down to him who now fills the episcopal seat. The oldest of these portraits touch the vaulting. Although they are painted in oil, they look as if they were in pastel or distemper; the reason being that paintings in Spain are not varnished, for want of which protection many valuable masterpieces have been destroyed by damp. The portraits, although most of them have a fine appearance, are not, however, by first-class painters, and they are hung too high to allow one to judge of the worth of the work. The centre of the hall is occupied by a huge dresser and immense esparto baskets, in which are kept the ornaments and the vessels employed in worship. Under two glass globes are preserved as curiosities two coral trees, much less complex in their branching than the least arabesque in the cathedral. The door is ornamented with the arms of Burgos in relief, with a semé of little crosses gules.

VERGARA — BURGOS

The chapel of Juan Cuchiller, which is next to this one, is not architecturally remarkable, and we were hurrying to leave it, when we were asked to look up and observe a most curious object,—a huge coffer, fastened to the wall by iron clamps. It is difficult to imagine a box more patched, worm-eaten, and broken; it is unquestionably the dean of earthly trunks. An inscription in black letters, which runs, Cofre del Cid, immediately gave, as you can readily believe, immense importance to these four planks of rotten wood. The coffer, if we are to believe the legend, is that which the famous Ruy de Bivar, better known as the Cid Campéador, having no money,—just like the ordinary writer,—caused to be carried, full of sand and pebbles, to a worthy Jewish usurer who lent upon due security, with orders that he was not to open the monstrous trunk until the Cid Campéador had repaid the sum borrowed; which goes to show that the usurers of those days were easier to get along with than those of our own times. Few Jews, and even few Christians could now be found simple and debonair enough to accept such collateral. The historic coffer is large, broad, heavy, and deep, and covered with all sorts of locks and padlocks; when full of sand, it must have taken at least six horses to drag it along; and the worthy Israelite might well suppose that it was filled with clothes, jewels, and silver-ware, and thus the more readily humour the Cid's whim, — a whim which has been provided for by the penal code, as well as many other heroic fancies.

BURGOS

ON leaving the chapel of Juan Cuchiller, you pass into another room very picturesquely decorated. The wainscoting is of oak, the hangings red, and the ceiling skilfully imitates Cordova leather. It contains a Nativity by Murillo, a Conception, and a Jesus wearing a robe, all well painted.

The cloister is filled with tombs, most of them closed with very close, strong gratings. The tombs, which all contain illustrious persons, are cut in the thickness of the wall and ornamented with coats of arms and embroidered with carvings. On one of them I noticed a group of Mary and Jesus, the latter holding a book in his hand, exquisitely beautiful, and a chimera, half animal, half arabesque, of strange and most surprising invention. On all these tombs rest life-size statues, either of knights in armour or of bishops in their robes, which might easily be mistaken, through the openings of the gratings, for the dead they represent, so correct is the attitude and so minute the detail.

On the jambs of a door I noticed, as I passed, a charming little statue of the Virgin, delightfully worked out and extraordinarily complete in conception. Instead of the contrite and modest air usually given to the Blessed Virgin, the sculptor has represented her with a glance in which voluptuousness mingles with ecstasy, in the intoxication of a woman who is conceiving a God. She stands with her head thrown back, breathing in with all her soul and strength the ray of flame impelled by the symbolic dove, with a strikingly original mingling of ardour and purity. It was difficult to find anything novel in a subject so frequently represented, but no subject is ever too worn out for a genius.

The description of the cloister alone would require a whole letter, and in view of the scant space and time at our disposal, you must forgive our saying but little about it, and returning to the church, where we shall take the masterpieces as they come, without choice or preference; for everything is beautiful or admirable, and what we may omit is at least as good as what we do speak of.

We shall stop first before a Passion of Jesus Christ, in stone, by Félipe Vigarni. It is one of the largest

BURGOS

bassi-relievi in the world. In accordance with Gothic custom, it is divided into several compartments: the Garden of Gethsemane, the Bearing of the Cross, the Crucifixion between the two thieves; a vast composition, which, by the delicate work on the heads and the fineness of the detail, is worth all that Albert Dürer, Hemeling, or Holbein did of most delicate and exquisite with their miniature-painter's brushes. This stone epic ends with a magnificent Entombment. The groups of sleeping apostles which fill the lower panels in the Garden of Gethsemane are almost as beautiful and in as pure a style as the prophets and saints of Fra Bartolommeo; the heads of the holy women at the foot of the cross have a pathetic and sorrowful expression, the secret of which was known to the Gothic artists alone. In this case, the expression is united to rare beauty of form. The soldiers are noticeable for quaint and fierce equipments, such as were given in the Middle Ages to antique, Oriental, or Jewish personages whose costume was not known. They are, besides, represented with a boldness and skill which contrast most happily with the idealism and melancholy of the other figures. The whole work is framed in by an architectural design wrought like goldsmith's work, of incredible taste and lightness. It was completed in 1536.

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

Since we are talking of sculpture, let us mention at once the choir stalls, which have probably no rival in the world. Each stall is a marvel. They represent subjects from the Old Testament in bas-relief, and are divided one from another by chimeras and fantastic animals which form the arms of the stall. The flat parts are formed of incrustations set off by black hatching like inlaid work on metal. And fancy arabesques have never been carried farther; both the conception and the execution exhibit inexhaustible spirit, incredible fertility, and constant invention. It is a new world, a separate creation, as complete and varied as that of God, in which plants live and men bloom, in which boughs end in hands, and limbs in foliage, in which chimeras with sly glance open wings provided with claws, and in which the monstrous dolphins blow forth water through their nostrils, — an incredible interlacing of flowers, foliage, acanthus leaves, lotus, and calyxes of blooms adorned with aigrettes and tendrils, of leaves curled and dentelated, of fabulous birds, impossible fishes, extravagant sirens and dragons, of which no description can give an idea. The freest fancy reigns in all these incrustations, the yellow tone of which, showing against the dark background of the wood, imparts the look of Etruscan painted vases, a look quite justified by the cleanness and primitive character of the outline. These designs, in which the pagan genius of the Renaissance shows out, have no connection with the purpose of the stalls, and at times, even, the choice of subject shows entire forgetfulness of the sacredness of the place: children playing with masks, women dancing, gladiators fighting, peasants gathering grapes, maidens tormenting or caressing a fantastic monster, animals playing on the harp, or even little boys imitating in the basin of a fountain the famous Manikin piece at Brussels. If the proportions were somewhat more slender these figures would be equal to the purest Etruscan work. Unity in aspect and infinite variety in detail, that is the difficult problem which mediæval artists have almost always solved successfully. At a distance of five or six yards, this carving, so fantastic in conception, is grave, solemn, architectural, brown in tone, and quite worthy of framing in the pale, austere faces of the canons.

The Constable's Chapel, capilla del Condestable, is a complete church in itself. The tombs of Don Pedro

Fernandez Velasco, Constable of Castile, and of his wife, occupy the centre and are no small ornament to it. They are of marble, superbly carved. The man is lying down in his battle armour, enriched with arabesques in the best style of art; the vergers take imprints of them with damp paper and sell them to tourists. His wife has her little dog by her side; her gloves and the pattern of her brocade robe are wrought with incredible delicacy. The heads of the pair rest upon marble pillows adorned with their coronet and their arms. Gigantic coats of arms adorn the walls of the chapel, and on the entablature are placed figures bearing stone staves for banners and standards. The retable—the architectural façades which accompany altars are thus called—is sculptured, gilded, painted, covered with arabesques and columns, and represents the Circumcision, the figures being life size. On the right side, where hangs the portrait of Donna Mencia de Mondoza, Countess of Haro, stands a little Gothic altar, illuminated, gilded, carved, adorned with an infinity of small figures, which one might take for the work of Antonin Moine, so light and cleverly done are they. On the altar there is a figure of Christ in jet. The high altar is adorned with plates of silver and crystal suns, whose flashing reflections produce a singularly brilliant play of light. On the vaulting blooms a sculptured rose of incredible delicacy.

In the sacristy, close to the chapel, is set in the panelling a Magdalen attributed to Leonardo da Vinci. The softness of the brown half-tints, which merge into the lights by imperceptible gradations, the lightness of touch with which the hair is painted, and the perfect roundness of the arms lend weight to this supposition. There is also preserved in this chapel the ivory diptych which the Constable was in the habit of taking with him into the field and before which he knelt in prayer. The Capilla del Condestable belongs to the Duke of Frias. As you go by, glance at the painted wood statue of Saint Bruno by Pereida, a Burgos sculptor, and at the epitaph to Villegas, the translator of Dante.

A great staircase, of noble design, with magnificent carved chimeras, compelled our admiration for a time. I do not know whither it leads and into what room opens the small door at the top, but it is worthy of the most splendid palace. The high altar in the chapel of the Dukes of Abrantes is one of the most curious inventions possible. It represents the genealogical tree of Jesus Christ. The strange idea is thus carried out: the Patriarch Abraham lies down at the foot of the composition, and into his fruitful loins plunge the many branched roots of a huge tree, each bough of which bears one of the ancestors of Jesus; the bough is subdivided into as many branches as there are descendants. At the top is the Blessed Virgin seated on a cloud throne; the sun, the moon, and the stars, silver and gilt, sparkle through the efflorescence of the boughs. It is terrifying to think what an amount of labour was required to carve out all these leaves and work out all these folds, to make all these branches, to cause all these figures to stand out from the background. This retable, thus wrought, is as large as the façade of a house and rises to a height of thirty-six feet at least, including the three stories, the second of which contains the Coronation of the Virgin, and the last the Crucifixion, with Saint John and the Virgin. The artist was Rodrigo del Haya, a sculptor who lived in the middle of the sixteenth century.

Saint Tecla's chapel is most peculiar. The architect and the sculptor seem to have aimed at compressing the greatest amount of ornament within the least possible space. It is a chapel in the richest, the most adorable, and the most charming bad taste. Everywhere are spiral columns wreathed with vine stems, volutes which roll into infinite curves, strings of cherubim cravated with wings, great swelling clouds, twisted flames rising from perfume-burners, beams that spread out fan-like, thick-blooming chicories, and the whole gilded and painted in natural colours with the skill of a miniaturist. The brocade of the draperies is worked out thread by thread, point by point, with amazing minuteness. The saint herself, in the midst of the flames stirred up by Saracens in extravagant costumes, turns to heaven her beautiful enamelled eyes, and holds in her little, flesh-coloured hand a great consecrated palm-branch curled in the Spanish fashion. The vaulting is wrought in the same taste, and other altars, of less dimensions but equally rich, fill the rest of the chapel. We are in the presence, not of Gothic delicacy or exquisite Renaissance taste, but of richness substituted for purity of line; nevertheless, it is still very handsome, very beautiful, as is every excessive thing complete in its own way.

The organ, of formidable size, has batteries of pipes arranged in a sloping manner like pointed guns, producing a threatening and warlike effect. The private chapels each have their organ, but of smaller size. On the retable of one of these chapels there is a painting of such beauty that I cannot attribute it to any other master than Michael Angelo. The unmistakable characteristics of the Florentine school at its finest show triumphantly in this magnificent painting, which would be the gem of the most splendid museum; yet Michael Angelo rarely painted in oils, and his paintings are fabulously rare. I incline to think that it is a composition painted by Sebastian del Piombo, after a cartoon and sketch by the sublime artist. It is known that, jealous of Raphael's success, Michael Angelo occasionally employed Sebastian del Piombo in order to unite colour to drawing and to surpass his young rival. Whoever the painter may be, the work itself is admirable. The Blessed Virgin, seated and nobly draped, veils with her transparent scarf the divine nudity of the child Jesus standing by her side; two contemplative angels float silently in the blue sky; in the background a stern landscape, rocks, stretches of ground, and a few broken walls. Words fail to give an idea of the majesty, calm, and power of the Virgin's head. The neck joins the shoulders with such chaste, pure, and noble lines, the face breathes such a sweet maternal peace, the hands are so divinely turned, the feet are so elegant and high-bred, that one cannot take one's eyes off the painting. Add to the marvellous drawing a simple, solid colouring, sustained in tone, without brilliancy, without petty seeking after light and shade, with a certain fresco look which perfectly matches the tone of the architecture, and you have a masterpiece the equal of which can be found only in the Florentine or Roman school.

There is also in the cathedral at Burgos a Holy Family, unsigned, which I greatly suspect to be the work of Andrea del Sarto; and Gothic paintings on panels by Cornelius Van Eyck, like those which are in the Dresden Museum. Paintings of the German school are not uncommon in Spain, and some of them are exceedingly beautiful. We may mention as we go some paintings by Fra Diego de Leyva—who turned monk and entered the Cartuja de Miraflores at the age of fifty-three—especially the one which represents the martyrdom of Saint Casilda, whose two breasts have been cut off by the executioner. Blood spouts in great streams from the two red spots left on the chest by the amputated flesh; the two breasts lie by the saint's side; she gazes with an expression of feverish and convulsive ecstasy at a tall angel with dreamy and melancholy face, who bears a palm to her. These terrifying paintings of martyrdoms are very numerous in Spain, where the love of realism and truth in art is carried to its utmost limit. The painter will not spare you a single drop of blood; you must see the severed nerves shrink, the living flesh quiver, and its dark purple contrast with the bloodless, bluish whiteness of the skin, the vertebræ cut by the executioner's cimeter, the cruel marks made by the whips and rods of the tormentors, the gaping wounds which vomit blood and water through their livid lips — all rendered with frightful accuracy. Ribeira has painted in this way things that would make el Verdugo himself shudder with horror; and it really takes all the dread beauty and the diabolical energy characteristic of that great master to enable one to bear with those ferocious slaughter-house paintings, which seem to have been done for cannibals by an executioner's assistant. It is enough to disgust one with being a martyr, and the angel with his palm strikes one as but a slight compensation for such atrocious torments. Ribeira very often refuses even this consolation to his tortured victims, whom he leaves lying, like the pieces of a serpent, in a dun, threatening shade which no divine ray illumines.

The need of truth, however repulsive it may be, is a characteristic feature of Spanish art; neither idealism nor conventionality enters into the genius of that people, which is wholly devoid of æsthetic feeling. Sculpture does not suffice for it; it must have coloured statues, Madonnas rouged and dressed in real dresses. Never, in its opinion, is material illusion carried far enough, and that excessive love of realism often makes it cross the slight distance which separates sculpture from wax figures. The famous and highly revered Christ of Burgos, which can be shown only after the candles have been lighted, is a striking example of that extraordinary taste. It is no longer painted stone or wood, it is a human skin,—so, at least, it is said,—stuffed with great skill and care; the hair is real, the eyes are provided with lashes, the crown of thorns is of genuine thorns,—not a single detail has been forgotten. But nothing can be more gloomy and more disturbing to behold than that tall crucified phantom, with its sham air of life and its deathly immobility. The skin, of a musty brown tone, is rayed by long streamlets of blood, so closely imitated that one really believes the blood is actually flowing. It does not require a great effort of imagination to credit the legend that this miraculous Crucified One bleeds every Friday. Instead of a fluttering drapery rolled around him, the Christ at Burgos wears a white kilt, embroidered with gold. This vestment produces a most peculiar effect, especially to those who are not accustomed to see Our Lord in such a costume. At the foot of the cross are set three ostrich-eggs, a symbolical ornament of which I do not catch the meaning, unless it be an allusion to the Trinity as being the germ of all things.

We left the cathedral dazzled, crushed, intoxicated with masterpieces, and with our powers of admiration exhausted. We were shown the Cid's house. I am wrong to say the Cid's house; I should say, the place where it may have been. It is a square piece of ground surrounded by posts; there does not remain the least vestige to authorise the belief, but there is nothing to prove the contrary, and therefore there is no reason why one should not trust the tradition.

Saint Mary's Gate, erected in honour of Charles V, is a remarkable piece of architecture. The statues placed in the niches, although short and thickset, have a look of strength and power which fully redeems their lack of height. Near the gate is the promenade, which runs along the Arlençon, a very respectable river, at least two feet deep; which is a great deal for Spain. This promenade is adorned with four statues, of rather fine appearance, representing the four kings, or counts of Castile: Don Fernando Gonzales, Don Alonzo, Don Enriquez II, and Don Fernando I. Beyond this, there is not much worth seeing in Burgos. The theatre is even more primitive than that of Vitoria. That evening there was being performed a play in verse, "The King and the Cobbler," by Zorilla, a very distinguished young writer very popular in Madrid, who has already published several volumes of verse, the style and harmony of which are highly spoken of. All the seats had been taken beforehand, and we had to forego this pleasure.

BURGOS

Before leaving Burgos we paid a visit to the Cartuja de Miraflores, situated a mile and a half from the gate of the city. A few poor old, infirm monks have been allowed to remain in this convent until they die. Spain lost a good deal of its romantic character when the monastic orders were suppressed, and I do not quite see what she has gained in other respects.

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

The cartuja is situated at the top of a hill. The exterior is simple and austere, great stone walls and tiled roofs; everything done for the mind, nothing for the eye: inside, long, cool, silent cloisters, white-washed with lime, cell doors, windows with leaden framework, in which are set biblical subjects in painted glass, especially an Ascension, the composition of which is curious: the body of the Lord has disappeared; His feet alone are seen, the prints of which are hollowed out upon a rock surrounded by holy personages who are filled with wonder.

A small court, in the centre of which rises a fountain from which sparkling water falls drop by drop, contains the prior's garden. A few vine tendrils light up the gloomy walls; a few flowers, a few plants grow here and there, much as they will, in picturesque disorder. The prior, an old man with noble and melancholy face, wearing a garment resembling a robe as closely as possible (the monks are not allowed to wear their costume), received us most politely and seated us around the braseró, for it was not very warm, and offered us cigarettes, azucarillos, and fresh water. A book lay open on the table. I took the liberty of glancing at it. It was the "Bibliotheca Cartuxiana," a collection of all the passages from different authors which praise the order and life of the Carthusians. The margins were annotated in his own hand, in that dear old priest's writing, straight, firm, somewhat heavy, which suggests so much, and which the quick-living, impetuous layman cannot master. So the poor monk, compassionately left in that abandoned convent, the vaulting of which will soon fall down upon his unknown grave, was still dreaming of the glory of his order, and with a trembling hand noting upon the white leaves of the book some forgotten or newly found passage.

BURGOS

The graveyard is shaded by two or three tall cypresses like those in Turkish cemeteries. This place of death contains four hundred and nineteen Carthusians who have died since the convent was erected. The ground is covered with thick, close grass, in which neither tomb, cross, nor inscription is visible. The dead lie there mingled together, as humble in death as they were in life. The calm and the silence of this anonymous cemetery are restful to the soul. A fountain in the centre sheds its limpid, silver tears over all these poor, forgotten dead. I drank a few drops of that water, filtered through the ashes of so many saintly men; it was pure and icy-cold, like death itself.

If the dwelling of men here is poor, that of God is splendid. In the centre of the nave are placed the tombs of Don Juan II and Queen Isabella, his wife. The human patience that built such a monument is amazing. Sixteen lions, two at each corner, supporting eight scutcheons bearing the royal arms, form the base. Add an equal number of virtues, allegorical figures, apostles, and evangelists; fill in with branches, foliage, birds, animals, a network of arabesques, and you have a very faint idea of this prodigious piece of work. The crowned statues of the King and Queen lie upon the top; the King holds his sceptre in his hand and wears a long robe ornamented with intertwining lines and flowered work of marvellous delicacy.

The tomb of the Infant Alonzo is on the Gospel side of the altar. The Infant is represented kneeling before a prie-dieu. An open-work vine, in which are perched children gathering grapes, festoons with ever varying fancifulness the Gothic arch which surrounds the composition, itself partially set into the wall. These marvellous monuments are in alabaster, and are the work of Gil de Silva, who also carved the high altar.

BURGOS

On the right and left of the altar, which is of wondrous beauty, are two open doors, through which one sees two motionless Carthusians dressed in their shroud-like white gowns. These two figures, which are probably by Diego de Leyva, completely deceive you at first glance. Stalls by Berruguete complete this ensemble, which one is surprised to meet with in a lonely countryside.

From the top of the hill we were shown in the distance San Pedro de Cardenas, where are the tombs of the Cid and Donna Ximenes, his wife. The only thing wanting to the Cid's glory was to be canonised, and he would have been if, just before dying, he had not had the Arabic, heretic, and ill-sounding notion to order that his famous horse Babieca should be buried with him, which cast a doubt upon his orthodoxy. Besides his merit as a hero, the Cid enjoys that of having inspired so well the unknown poets of the Romanceros, Guillen de Castro, Diamante, and Pierre Corneille.

THE royal mail-coach in which we left Burgos deserves to be described. Imagine an antediluvian carriage, of an obsolete model to be met with in fossil Spain only; enormous splayed wheels, with very thin spokes, placed very far behind the body, which had been painted red in the days of Isabella the Catholic; an extravagant body, pierced with all sorts of odd-shaped windows and furnished inside with small cushions covered with satin, which may have been rose-coloured at some distant period, and trimmed with pinkings and ornaments of chenille, which may very well have been of many colours. This antique coach-body is artlessly hung with ropes instead of springs, and the weak places are lashed with esparto cords. To the coach is harnessed a fairly long string of mules, with an assortment of postilions and a mayoral, wearing an Astrakhan lamb-skin jacket and sheep-skin trousers of a most Moscovitish appearance.

VALLADOLID

Away we went in this concern in the midst of a whirlwind of shouts, oaths, and crackings of whips. We went like the very devil ; we flew over the ground, and the vague outlines of surrounding objects flashed on the right and on the left with phantasmagoric rapidity. I have never seen more spirited, restive, or wilder mules. At every relay it took a host of muchachos to harness one to the carriage. The devilish beasts emerged from the stable walking on their hind legs, and the only way to reduce them to the condition of quadrupeds was to hang a bunch of postilions to their bridle.

The country we travelled was singularly wild ; great barren plains, the monotony of which was unbroken by a single tree, bounded by ochre-yellow mountains, and hills to which the distance could scarcely communicate a faint blue tone. From time to time we traversed earthy-looking villages with walls built of clay, and most of them in ruins. As it was Sunday there stood along these yellowish walls, lighted up by a faint sunbeam, motionless as mummies, files of haughty Castilians draped in their snuff-coloured rags, occupied in tomar el sol, an amusement the dulness of which would kill in an hour the most phlegmatic of Germans. However, this characteristic Spanish enjoyment was perfectly excusable on that day, for it was atrociously cold. A fierce wind swept the plain with a roar as of thunder, and of chariots full of armour driven over brazen vaults. I do not believe that anything wilder, more barbarous, and more primitive could be met with among Hottentot kraals or Kalmuck camps. Profiting by a halt, I entered one of the huts. It was a windowless den, with a hearth of rough stones placed in the centre, and a hole in the roof to allow the smoke to emerge. The walls were of a bituminous brown worthy of Rembrandt.

We dined at Torrequemada, a pueblo situated upon a small river, the bed of which is filled up with the ruins of old fortifications. Torrequemada is noticeable for its total lack of glass windows. Glass panes are to be found in the tavern only, the kitchen of which, in spite of this incredible piece of luxury, is nevertheless provided with a hole in the roof. After having swallowed a few garbanzos, which rattled in our stomach like shot on a tambourine, we got back into our box and the steeple-chase began once more. The coach behind the mules was like a pan tied to a tiger's tail; the noise it made excited them still more; a straw fire burning in the middle of the road nearly made them bolt; they were so skittish that they had to be held by the bridle and their eyes covered with the hand when another carriage met us. As a general rule, when two carriages drawn by mules meet, one of them is bound to be upset, and by and by what was bound to happen did happen. I was busy turning over in my mind a hemistich, as is my habit in travelling, when I saw coming towards me, describing a rapid parabola, my companion who was sitting opposite to me. His action was followed by a very heavy shock and a general smashing of the carriage. "Are you dead?" asked my friend, as he finished his curve. "On the contrary," I replied; "are you?" "Not quite," he answered. We got out as quickly as we could by the broken roof of the poor coach, which was broken into a thousand pieces. As for the mules, they had gone off, and had carried away the fore-body and the two front wheels. Our own personal loss amounted to one button, which gave way owing to the violence of the shock and could never be found again. It was really impossible to upset more satisfactorily.

In other respects our position was not particularly pleasant, although we were seized with a most un-

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

seasonable fit of laughter. Our mules had vanished into smoke and our coach was dismantled and wheelless. Happily the venta was not very far off, and a couple of galleys were fetched and took us and our luggage. The galley thoroughly deserves its name. It is a two-wheeled or four-wheeled cart without top or bottom. The trunks and packages are placed in a net of reed ropes. On top of them is laid a mattress, a true Spanish mattress, which in no wise prevents your feeling the corners of the luggage thrown in pell-mell. The patients seat themselves as best they can upon this rack, by the side of which Saint Laurence's and Gautimozin's grid-irons were beds of roses, for at least on those one could turn around. In this dreadful vehicle, which had no manner of springs, we drove at the rate of about four Spanish leagues an hour, that is to say, about five French leagues, or three miles faster than the best mail-coaches on the finest roads; the road we were travelling over was full of very steep hills and very sharp slopes, down which we always went at full gallop. It takes all the assurance and skill of the Spanish postilions and conductors to prevent the whole business smashing up into innumerable bits at the bottom of precipices ; — instead of being upset once, we ought really to have been upsetting all the time.

---

Dueñas looks like a Turkish cemetery. The caves, which are dug out of the living rock, receive air through small turrets which swell out like turbans and look singularly like minarets. A church of Moorish appearance completes the illusion. To the left the Canal of Castile shows from time to time in the plain. It is not yet finished.

At Venta de Trigueros there was harnessed to our galley a rose-coloured horse of remarkable beauty (the mules had been given up), which fully justified Eugène Delacroix, whose horse in the “Triumph of Trajan” has been criticised. Men of genius are always right; what they invent exists, and nature imitates their most eccentric fancies, or nearly all of them.

After having followed a road running between embankments and buttressed counterforts quite monumental in character, we at last entered Valladolid ; pretty well broken up, but with our noses intact and our arms still fixed to our bodies.

We alighted at a superb parador, perfectly clean and were given two fine rooms, with a balcony looking out upon a square, carpets of coloured matting, and walls painted in distemper in yellow and apple-green. Up to this time we have seen no reason for the charge of filth and bareness which all travellers have brought against Spanish inns. We have not yet found any scorpions in our beds, and the insects we were threatened with have not put in an appearance.

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

Valladolid is a great city almost wholly depopulated. It is capable of containing two hundred thousand souls, and has not much more than twenty thousand inhabitants. It is a clean, quiet, elegant city, which feels its nearness to the Orient. The façade of San Pablo is covered from top to bottom with marvellous carving of the time of the early Renaissance. In front of the portal are ranged by way of posts granite pillars surmounted by heraldic lions, which hold in every possible position shields bearing the arms of Castile. Opposite is a palace of the time of Charles V, with an arcaded courtyard extremely elegant, and sculptured medallions of rare beauty. The Inland Revenue sells in this architectural gem its wretched salt and abominable tobacco. By a happy chance the façade of San Pablo is situated on a square ; thus it may be photographed, which is very difficult in the case of mediæval buildings, which are almost always set in the midst of groups of houses and vile stalls; but the rain, which never ceased falling all the time we remained in Valladolid, did not permit us to get a picture. Twenty minutes' sunshine between the showers at Burgos had enabled us to get capital plates of the spires of the cathedral and of a large portion of the portal; but at Valladolid we did not even have the twenty minutes, which we regretted all the more that the city abounds in charming specimens of architecture.

The building in which the library is placed, and which it is proposed to turn into a museum, is in the purest and most exquisite taste. Although some of the ingenious restorers who prefer boards to bassi-relievi have shamefully scraped its admirable arabesques, there still remain enough to constitute a masterpiece of elegance. Draughtsmen would be interested in a balcony which projects from the corner of a palace in this same San Pablo Square, and forms a look-out singularly original in taste. The section of the small column which connects the two arches is quite remarkable. It was in this house, we were told, that the terrible Philip II was born. We may also mention a colossal fragment of an unfinished granite cathedral by Herrera, in the style of Saint Peter's at Rome. This building was abandoned in favour of the Escorial, that gloomy fancy of the gloomy son of Charles V.

We were shown, in a closed church, a collection of paintings which had been brought together after the closing of the convents, and had been put in this place by order of the authorities. It appears that the people who pillaged the churches and convents were excellent artists and admirable connoisseurs, for they left merely horrible daubs, the best of which would not fetch five francs in a curiosity shop. In the museum there are a few passable paintings, but nothing worth speaking of; on the other hand, numerous wooden carvings and ivory crucifixes, remarkable more for their size and their age than for the real beauty of the work. People who go to Spain to purchase curiosities are apt to be greatly disappointed: there is not a single valuable weapon, not a single rare edition, not a single manuscript to be had.

The Plaza de la Constitucion at Valladolid is very handsome and very large, surrounded by houses up-borne by great bluish granite columns in one piece, which have a fine effect. The Palace of the Constitution, painted apple-green, is adorned with an inscription in honour of Innocent Isabella, as the little queen is called here, and with a clock-dial lighted at night like that of the Hôtel de Ville at Paris, — an innovation which appears to delight the inhabitants. Under the arcades are established multitudes of tailors, hatters, and shoemakers, the three most flourishing trades in Spain. There also are situated the chief cafés, and all the population seems to concentrate at this point: in the rest of the city you scarcely meet an occasional passer-by, — a servant-girl carrying water, or a peasant driving his donkey. The effect of solitude is further increased by the great extent of ground over which the city is spread; squares are more numerous than streets. The Campo Grande, near the great gate, is surrounded by fifteen convents, and more could be put on it.

On leaving Valladolid the character of the landscape changes and the barrens reappear; only, they have what is lacking to those of Bordeaux, clumps of stunted green oaks and more wide-spreading pines; otherwise they are just as arid, lonely, and desolate-looking, — here and there a few heaps of ruins which are called villages, and which have been burned and ravaged by rebels, and in which wander a few ragged and wretched-looking inhabitants. There is nothing picturesque but a few women's skirts, of the brightest canary-yellow, adorned with embroidery in several shades representing birds and flowers.

Olmedo, where we stopped for dinner, is completely ruined ; whole streets are deserted, others are filled up by the fallen houses, the grass grows in the squares as in the accursed cities of which the Bible speaks ; soon there will be no other inhabitants in Olmedo than the flat-headed viper, and the short-sighted owl, and the dragon of the desert will drag his scaly belly over the stones of the altars. A belt of old and dismantled fortification surrounds the city, and the charitable ivy covers with its green mantle the bareness of the ruined, gaping towers. Tall, handsome trees border the ramparts and Nature does its best to repair the ravages of time and war. The diminution of the population of Spain is frightful. In the time of the Moors it had thirty-two millions of inhabitants ; now it scarcely has more than ten to eleven millions. Unless some fortunate but scarcely probable change occurs, or marriages become supernaturally fecund, cities formerly flourishing will be wholly abandoned, and their brick and clay ruins will, little by little, melt away into the earth, which devours everything, both cities and men.

The landscape beyond Olmedo is not very varied in character; only, I noticed before we reached the place where we were to sleep a beautiful sun effect. The luminous beams lighted up the slope of a chain of very distant mountains, every detail of which stood out with extraordinary clearness; their sides bathed in shade were almost invisible, the heavens were leaden. A painter who should reproduce such an effect accurately would be charged with exaggeration and inaccuracy.

The posada, this time, was much more Spanish than those we had hitherto seen. It consisted of a vast stable, surrounded by whitewashed rooms, each containing four or five beds. It was wretched and bare, but not unclean. The characteristic proverbial filth had not yet put in an appearance; there was even unheard-of luxury in the dining room, — a series of engravings representing the adventures of Telemachus; hideous coloured daubs with which Paris floods the universe.

We started again in the morning, and when the first light of dawn enabled us to distinguish the scene, I beheld a sight which I shall never forget. We had just changed horses at a village called, I think, Saint Mary of the Snows, and we were climbing the foot-hills of the chain we had to cross. We seemed to be in the midst of a cyclopean city. Huge sandstone blocks that looked like buildings rose on every hand and stood out against the sky like the silhouettes of fantastic Babels. Here a flat stone which had fallen across two other rocks, closely resembled a Druidical peulven or dolmen; a little farther a succession of peaks, shaped like the shafts of columns, imitated porticoes and propylæa; or again it was a chaos, a sandstone ocean, petrified at the moment when it was lashed to maddest fury. The grayish-blue tone of the rocks heightened still more the strangeness of the prospect. Everywhere from the interstices of the stones spurted the spray or the crystal drops of springs, and what particularly delighted me was that the melted snow ran into the hollows and formed little pools bordered by an emerald-coloured sward, or set in a silver circle of snow which had resisted the action of the sun. Pillars erected from point to point, which served to indicate the road when the snow stretches its treacherous mantle over both the road track and the precipices, imparted to it a monumental aspect. Torrents roared and foamed on all hands; the road crossed them over dry stone bridges such as are to be met with at every step in Spain.

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

VALLADOLID

The mountains rose higher and higher; we had no sooner crossed one than another and loftier one rose, which we had not before seen. The mules proved unequal to the work, and recourse was had to oxen. This allowed us to descend, and to climb on foot the rest of the sierra. I was fairly intoxicated by the pure, bracing air. I felt so light, joyous, and enthusiastic that I shouted, and leaped like a kid.

The high peaks sparkled and twinkled in the beams of the sun like a dancer's silver-spangled bodice; some of the peaks were cloud-capped, and melted into the heavens by imperceptible gradations, for nothing is so like a cloud as a mountain. The scarps and undulations, the tones and the forms, were such as no art can give an idea of, no pen or brush suggest. The mountains realised all that we have dreamed they would be, which is no slight praise. Only, we imagined them higher; their vast size is to be perceived only by comparison. On looking closer, what has been mistaken from afar for a blade of grass is a sixty-foot pine.

At the turn of a bridge, admirably adapted for a highwayman's ambushade, we saw a small column with a cross. It was a monument in memory of a poor devil who had ended his days in this narrow gorge, driven to this through manea irada (the angry hand). From time to time we met Maragatos in their sixteenth-century costume: a leather jacket buckled tight, full trousers, and broad-brimmed hats; Valencianos, with their white linen drawers resembling a Klepht's kilts, a handkerchief tied around their heads, footless white gaiters edged with blue, like the knemis of antiquity, a long piece of stuff (capa de muestra) with cross stripes of brilliant colours, draped in very elegant fashion over the shoulders. So far as their skin could be seen, it was the colour of Florentine bronze. We also saw trains of mules harnessed in charming fashion, with bells, fringes, and many-coloured blankets, and the arrieros carrying carbines. We were delighted; the wished-for picturesque was turning up abundantly.

As we proceeded higher, the strips of snow became thicker and broader, but a ray of sunshine made the whole mountain gleam like a woman laughing through her tears. On all sides meandered little brooklets, scattered like the disordered hair of naiads and more limpid than diamonds. By dint of climbing we reached the topmost crest, and sat down upon the pedestal of a huge granite lion which marks, at the top of the watershed, the boundaries of Old Castile. Seized with the fancy to pluck a lovely rose-coloured flower, whose botanical name I do not know but which grows in the cracks of the sandstone, we climbed a rock which we were told was the place where Philip II used to sit and watch the progress of the work on the Escorial. Either the tradition is apocryphal or Philip had uncommonly good sight.

The coach, which was crawling slowly up the steep slopes, at last caught us up, the oxen were unharnessed, and we galloped down the descent. We stopped to dine at Guadarrama, a little village nestling at the foot of the mountain, and whose sole monument is a granite fountain erected by Philip II. Here, through a strange inversion of the natural order of dishes, our dessert consisted of goat's-milk soup.

Madrid, like Rome, is surrounded by desert country, barren, dry, and mournful beyond all conception. There is not a tree nor a drop of water, not a green plant nor a trace of humidity, nothing but yellow sand and iron-gray rocks ; and as one leaves the mountains behind, the rocks become stones only; here and there a dusty venta, or a cork-coloured steeple which pokes up on the edge of the horizon; big, melancholy oxen dragging chariots, a fierce-looking peasant riding a horse or mule, his carbine at his saddle-bow, his sombrero pulled down over his eyes; or again, long lines of white asses carrying cut straw tied with network, — and that is all. The leading ass, or coronel, always wears a little plume or pompon, which marks his rank in the long-eared hierarchy.

A few hours later, which seemed longer, so impatient were we to arrive, we at last saw Madrid plainly enough, and in a few minutes we entered the capital of Spain by the Iron Gate. The coach first proceeded down an avenue planted with stout polled trees, and bordered by brick towers, which are pumping stations. Speaking of water, although the transition is not a happy one, I forgot to tell you that we had crossed the Manzanares on a bridge worthy of a more genuine river. Then we proceeded past the Queen's Palace, which is one of those buildings which it is customary to say are in good taste. The vast terraces upon which it rises give it a fairly grand appearance. After having undergone inspection at the Customs, we put up close to the Calle de Alcala and the Prado, and we lost no time in sending Manuel, our valet, who was a thorough-paced aficionado and tauromachian, to purchase tickets for the next bull-fight.

NEVER did any days seem so long to me; to quiet my impatience I read more than ten times over the posters at the corners of the principal streets. They promised marvels: eight bulls from the most famous breeding-ground; for picadores Sevilla and Antonio Rodriguez; for espadas Juan Pastor, called also el Barbero, and Guillen; winding up with orders to the public not to throw into the arena orange-peels and other projectiles which might damage the combatants.

The name matador is not much used in Spain to designate the man who slays the bull; he is called espada (sword), which is nobler and more high-toned; nor do they say toreador, but torero. I present this useful piece of information, by the way, to those who indulge in local colour in drawing-room songs and comic opera. The fight is called media corrida, or half performance, because formerly there were two every Monday, one in the morning, the other at five in the afternoon, and the two together made up a performance. The afternoon function has alone survived.

It has been said and repeated everywhere that the taste for bull-fights is going out in Spain, and that civilisation will do away with them. If it does so, it will be so much the worse for civilisation, for a bull-fight is one of the finest spectacles man can see; but the day has not yet come, and tender-hearted writers who affirm the contrary had better go some Monday to the Alcala Gate, and they will be convinced that the taste for this ferocious enjoyment is far from dying out.

Monday, the Day of Bulls, dia de toros, is a holiday; no one works, the whole town is up. Those who have not yet secured their tickets hasten to the Calle de Caritas, where is situated the box office, in hopes of finding some vacant seat; for by an arrangement which cannot be too highly praised, the whole of the enormous amphitheatre is divided into numbered stalls. The Calle de Alcala, which is the main artery into which the populous streets of the city empty, is full of foot-passengers, horsemen, and carriages. For on this day emerge from dusty coach-houses the most comical and extravagant calesas and carriages, the most fantastic equipages, the most amazing mules. The calesas are like the Neapolitan corricola. They have great red wheels, no springs, a carriage body adorned with more or less allegorical pictures and upholstered in old damask or faded serge, with silk fringes and trimmings ; the whole having a curious rococo air which produces a most comical effect. The driver sits on the shaft, whence he can harangue and beat his mule in comfort, and this leaves one seat the more for his clients. The mule itself is adorned with as many plumes, pompons, tufts, fringes, and balls as can possibly be put on the harness of any sort of a quadruped. The calesa usually contains a manola and her female friend, with her manolo, besides a bunch of muchachos hanging on behind. The whole concern goes like the wind, in a whirlwind of shouts and dust. There are also coaches drawn by four or five mules, the like of which are to be met with only in the paintings of Van der Meulen which represent the conquests and the hunts of Louis XIV. All sorts of wheeled vehicles are called into use, for to drive in a calesa to the bull-fight is the most stylish thing a manola can do. She will pledge her very bed in order to have some money for that day, and without being exactly virtuous during the rest of the week, she is certainly very much less so on Sundays and Mondays. Country people are also seen, coming in on horseback, their carbines at their saddle-bow; others mounted on asses, either by themselves or with their wives; besides the carriages of the society people, and a multitude of worthy citizens and señoras wearing mantillas, who hasten on: for now comes the detachment of mounted national guards, trumpeters in front, riding forward to clear the arena, and for nothing in the world would the spectators miss the clearing of the arena and the precipitate flight of the alguazil when he has thrown to the official of the fight the key of the toril, where are shut up the horned gladiators. The toril is opposite the matadero, where the dead animals are skinned. The bulls are brought the day before by night into a meadow near Madrid called el arroyo, which is the place whither go to walk the aficionados, — a walk which is not without danger, for the bulls are at liberty and their drivers have a great deal of trouble in looking after them. Then they are driven into the amphitheatre stable with the help of old oxen accustomed to the work and who mingle with the fierce herd. The Plaza de Toros is situated to the left, outside the Alcala Gate, which, by the way, is a rather fine gate, somewhat like a triumphal arch, with trophies and other heroic ornaments. It is a huge circus, which is in no wise remarkable externally; the walls are whitewashed. As every one has secured a ticket beforehand, there is no disorder at the entrance; every one climbs to his seat and takes the one marked with his number.

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

MADRID

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

The interior is well arranged. Around the arena, which is truly Roman in size, runs a circular wooden fence six feet high, painted red, and provided on each side, two feet above the level of the ground, with a wooden ledge, on which the chulos and banderilleros rest one foot in order to spring over when they are too sharply pressed by the bull. The fence is called las tablas. There are four doors in it, which give the attendants or the bulls access to the arena, and which also allow of the removal of the bodies, etc. Outside this fence there is another rather higher, which forms with the first a sort of passageway in which stand the chulos when they are tired, the substitute picadore (sobresaliente) who is bound to be there, ready dressed and armed, in case his chief should happen to be wounded or killed, — the cachetero; and some aficionados who by dint of perseverance manage, in spite of regulations, to make their way into that coveted passage, entrance to which is as much sought after in Spain as entrance to the wings of the Opera in Paris.

As it often happens that the maddened bull leaps the first fence, the second is further provided with a network of rope intended to prevent a repetition of the spring. A number of carpenters stand ready with axes and hammers to repair any damage which may happen to the enclosures so that accidents are practically impossible. And yet bulls (technically called multas piernas, many-legged) have been known to leap the second fence, as is proved by an engraving in Goya's "Tauromaquia." The engraving of the famous author of the "Caprices" represents the death of the alcalde of Torrezon, gored by a leaping bull.

Beyond the second fence begin the benches intended for the spectators. Those nearest the ropes are called barrera seats, the centre ones tendido, and those which are against the first row of gradas de cubierta are called tablancillos. These benches, which recall those of the Roman amphitheatre, are of bluish granite and have no other roof than the sky. Immediately above come the covered seats, gradas cubiertas, which are divided into delantera, or front seats, centro, or centre seats, and tabloncillo, back seats. Above these rise the boxes, called palcos and palcos por asientos, one hundred and ten in number. These boxes are very large and can each contain a score of spectators. The palco por asientos differs from the ordinary box in that a single seat may be hired in it, like the balcony stalls at the Opera. The boxes of the Queen Regent and the "Innocent Isabella" are ornamented with draperies of silk and enclosed in curtains. Next to them is the box of the ayuntamiento, who presides over the sports and has to settle any difficulties which occur.

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

The circus, so divided, contains twelve thousand spectators, all comfortably seated and seeing easily; an indispensable matter in a spectacle intended purely for the eyes. The vast place is always full, and those who cannot procure sombra seats (shady seats) would rather cook alive on the benches in the burning sun than miss a fight. It is the proper thing for people who wish to be considered in good society to have their box at the bull-fight, just as in Paris one has a box at the Italian opera.

When I issued from the corridor to take my seat, I felt dazzled and giddy. Torrents of light poured down upon the circus, for the sun is a superior light-giver which has the advantage of not shedding oil, and it will be long before gas itself will replace it. A vast rumour rose, like a mist of noise, above the arena; on the sunny side fluttered and sparkled thousands of fans, and little round parasols with reed handles. They looked like swarms of birds of changing colours, trying to take flight. There was not a single empty seat. I can assure you that to see twelve thousand spectators in a theatre so vast that God alone can paint the ceiling of it with the splendid blue which he draws from the urn of eternity, is in itself a wonderful spectacle.

The mounted tainonal guards, very well horsed and very well dressed, were riding around the arena, preceded by two alguazils wearing hats and plumes of the time of Henry IV, black doublet and cloak and knee-boots. They drove away a few obstinate aficionados and belated dogs. The arena having been cleared, the two alguazils went to fetch the toreros, composed of the picadores, the chulos, the banderilleros, and the espada, who is the chief actor in the drama. These entered to the sound of trumpets. The picadores ride blindfolded horses, for the sight of the bull might frighten the steeds and cause them to swerve dangerously. The costume of the riders is very picturesque.

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

It consists of a short, open jacket, of orange, green, or blue velvet, heavily embroidered with silver or gold, with spangles, quillings, fringes, filigree buttons, and ornaments of all sorts, especially on the shoulders, where the velvet completely disappears under a luminous phosphorescent network of interlaced arabesques; a vest of the same style, a shirt with lace front, a striped cravat carelessly knotted, a silk girdle; breeches of buffalo hide stuffed and lined inside with tin like postilions' boots, as a protection for the legs against the horns of the bull; a very wide-brimmed gray hat (sombrero), low crowned, with an enormous bunch of favours; a heavy purse or cadogan of black ribbon, which is called, I think, moño, and which binds the hair behind the head. The weapon is a lance fitted with a point one or two inches in length, which cannot wound the bull severely, but is sufficient to irritate and to keep him back; a leather band fitted to the hand prevents the lance slipping. The saddle rises very high in front and behind, and resembles the steel clad saddles in which were set the knights of the Middle Ages at their tourneys; the stirrups are of wood, in the shape of a half-shoe like Turkish stirrups. A long iron spur, sharp as a dagger, is fitted to the horseman's heel. To urge on the horses, often half dead, an ordinary spur would not be sufficient.

The chulos look very bright and gay in their satin knee-breeches, green, blue, or pink, embroidered with silver on every seam, their silk stockings, white or flesh-coloured, their jacket adorned with designs and ornaments, their tight belts, and their little montera perched coquettishly upon the ear. They carry on their arm a stuff mantle (capa), which they unroll and flutter before the bull to irritate, dazzle, or bewilder it. They are well made, slender young fellows, unlike the picadores, who are usually noticeable for their very great height and athletic proportions. These have to depend on their strength, the others on their agility.

The banderilleros wear the same costume, and their particular office is to strike into the shoulders of the bull a sort of arrow fitted with a barbed iron and adorned with strips of paper. These arrows are called banderillas, and are intended to excite the fury of the bull and exasperate it sufficiently to make it come well up to the matador's sword. Two banderillas must be stuck in at the same time, and in order to do that, both arms must be passed between the bull's horns;

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

a ticklish operation, during the performance of which any absent-mindedness would be dangerous.

The espada's costume differs from that of the banderilleros only in being richer, more splendidly adorned, and in being occasionally of purple silk, a colour peculiarly distasteful to the bull. The espada's weapons are a cross-sword with a long hilt, and a piece of scarlet stuff fixed to a cross-stick. The technical name of this sort of fluttering buckler is muleta. Now that you are acquainted with the stage and the actors, I shall show you them at work.

The picadores, escorted by the chulos, proceed to the box of the ayuntamiento, where they perform a salute, and whence are thrown to them the keys of the toril. These keys are picked up and handed to the alguazil, who bears them to the official of the ring and gallops off as hard as he can, amid the yells and shouts of the crowd; for alguazils and all representatives of justice are no more popular in Spain than are the police and city guard with us. Meanwhile the two picadores take their stand on the left of the gates of the toril, which is opposite the Queen's box, the entrance of the bull being one of the most interesting points in the performance. They are posted close to each other, backed up against the tablas, firmly seated in their saddles, lance in rest and ready to receive bravely the fierce animal. The chulos and banderilleros stand at a distance or scatter about the arena.

All these preparations, which are longer in description than in reality, excite curiosity to the highest degree. All eyes are anxiously fixed upon the fatal gate, and of the twelve thousand glances, there is not one turned in any other direction. The handsomest woman upon earth could not obtain the alms of a look at that moment.

I confess that for my part I felt my heart clutched, as it were, by an invisible hand, my temples throbbed, and cold and hot sweat broke out over me; the emotion I then felt was one of the fiercest I have ever experienced.

A shrill blare of trumpets was heard, the two red halves of the door were thrown open noisily, and the bull dashed into the arena, welcomed by a tremendous cheer. It was a superb animal, almost black, shining, with a huge dewlap, square head, sharp, polished, crescent-like horns, clean limbed, a restless tail, and bearing between the two shoulders a bunch of ribbons of the colours of its ganaderia, held to the skin by sharp points. It stopped for a second, breathed heavily two or three times, dazzled by the daylight and astonished by the tumult, then catching sight of the first picador, he charged him furiously. The picador thus attacked was Sevilla. I cannot resist the pleasure of describing that famous Sevilla, who is really the ideal picador. Imagine a man about thirty years of age, handsome, high-bred looking, and as robust as Hercules, brown as a mulatto, with superb eyes and a face recalling that which Titian gave to his Cæsars. The expression of jovial and disdainful serenity which marks his features and his attitude has really something heroic about it. On that day he wore an orange jacket embroidered and trimmed with silver, which has remained imprinted on my mind with ineffaceable accuracy. He lowered the point of his lance, steadied himself, and bore the shock of the bull so admirably that the furious brute staggered past him bearing away a wound which before long rayed its black skin with red streaks. It stopped, hesitating, for a few moments, then charged with increased fury the second picador, posted a little farther along.

Antonio Rodriguez drove in a great lance-thrust which opened a second wound close to the first, for the shoulder alone must be struck; but the bull charged upon him with lowered head, and plunged his whole horn into the horse's belly. The chulos hastened up, fluttering their capes, and the stupid animal, attracted and distracted by this new bait, pursued them at full speed; but the chulos, setting foot upon the ledge we have mentioned, sprang lightly over the fence, leaving the animal greatly disconcerted at seeing no one.

The thrust of the horn had ripped open the horse's belly so that the entrails were running out and falling almost to the ground. I thought the picador would withdraw to take another horse. Not in the least. He touched the animal's ear to see if the blow was mortal. The horse was merely ripped up; the wound, though hideous to behold, might be healed. The intestines were pushed back into the belly, two or three stitches taken, and the poor brute served for another charge. He spurred it and galloped off to take his place further away.

The bull began to perceive that he had not much to gain except lance-thrusts in the direction of the picadores, and felt a desire to go back to the pasturage grounds. Instead of charging without hesitation, he started, after a short rush, to return to his querencia with imperturbable obstinacy. The querencia is the technical name for any corner of the arena which the bull chooses for a refuge and to which it always returns after the cogida, as its attack is called, and after the suerte, or torero's attack, which is also called diestro.

A cloud of chulos flashed before its eyes their capes of brilliant colours; one of them carried his insolence so far as to place his rolled up mantle on the bull's head. The maddened animal got rid, as well as it could, of this unpleasant ornament, and tossed the harmless piece of stuff, which it trampled with rage when it fell to the ground. Profiting by this renewed burst of wrath, a chulo began to tease it and to draw it towards the picadores. Finding itself opposite its enemies, the bull hesitated, then making up its mind, charged Sevilla so fiercely that the horse rolled over, for Sevilla's arm is a bronze buttress which nothing can bend. Sevilla fell under the horse, which is the best way to fall, for the man is thus protected from being gored, and the body of the horse serves as a shield. The chulos intervened and the horse was got off with a ripped thigh; Sevilla was picked up, and he got back into the saddle with perfect coolness. The steed of Antonio Rodriguez, the other picador, was less fortunate. It was gored so fiercely in the chest that the horn went right in and disappeared completely in the wound. While the bull was trying to disengage its head, caught in the body of the horse, Antonio clutched with his hands the top of the fence, which he leaped with the help of the chulos, for the picadores, when thrown, weighed down by the metal linings of their boots, can move scarcely more easily than the knights of old, boxed up in their armour.

The poor horse, left to itself, could but stagger across the arena as if it were intoxicated, stumbling over its own entrails; torrents of black blood flowed from its wound and marked irregular zigzags upon the sand which betrayed the unevenness of its gait. Finally it fell near the tablas. It raised its head two or three times, its blue eye already glazed, turning up its lips white with foam, which showed its bare teeth; its tail faintly beat the ground, its hind legs were convulsively drawn up and struck out in a last kick, as if it had tried to break with its hard hoof the thick skull of death. Its agony was scarcely over when the muchachos on duty, seeing the bull busy elsewhere,

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

hastened to take off the saddle and bridle. The dead horse remained stripped, lying on its side, its brown silhouette showing against the sand. It was so thin, so flattened out, that it might have been cut out of black paper. I had already noticed at Montfaucon the strangely fantastic forms which death gives to horses. Its head, so noble, so cleanly shaped, modelled and moulded by the terrible finger of nothingness, seems to have been the dwelling of human thought; the mane which flows out, the tail which is spread out, have something picturesque and poetic about them. A dead horse is a corpse; every other animal from which life has departed is nothing but a dead brute.

I have spoken at length of the death of this horse because it gave me the most painful sensation which I felt at the bull-fight. It was not the only victim, however; fourteen other horses were slain; one bull alone killed five of them.

The picador returned with a fresh mount, and there were several charges more or less fortunate, but the bull was beginning to tire and its fury to abate. The banderilleros arrived with their papered arrows, and soon the bull's neck was adorned with a collar of cut paper which the very efforts that he made to get rid of it drove in more firmly. A small banderillero called Majaron, drove in the darts with great skill and boldness, and sometimes even he performed a cross-caper before withdrawing. Needless to say, he was loudly applauded. When the bull had in him seven or eight banderillas, the irons of which tore his head and the paper of which rattled in his ears, he began to gallop here and there and to bellow horridly. His black muzzle was wet with foam, and in his rage he dealt such a fierce blow with his horns to one of the doors that he threw it from the hinges. The carpenters, who were watching his movements, immediately replaced the door. A chulo drew him in another direction, but was pursued so fiercely that he scarcely had time to leap the fence. The maddened and exasperated bull made a prodigious effort and leaped the fence. All those who were in the passage sprang with marvellous speed into the arena, and the bull re-entered by another gate, driven off with sticks and hats by the spectators in the lowest row of benches.

The picadores withdrew, leaving the field to Juan Pastor, the espada, who proceeded to pay his respects to the ayuntamiento and asked leave to slay the bull. The permission being granted, he threw away his montera, by way of showing that he was going to stake his all, and walked up deliberately to the bull, concealing his sword in the red folds of the muleta.

The espada waved rapidly the scarlet stuff, which the bull blindly charged. A slight movement of the body sufficed to avoid the rush of the fierce animal, which soon charged again, striking fiercely at the light stuff, which it pushed aside without being able to pierce it. A favourable opportunity presenting itself, the espada took up his position exactly opposite the bull, waving his muleta in his left hand, and holding his sword horizontally, the point on a level with the animal's horns. It is difficult to render in words the anguished curiosity, the frenzied tension excited by this situation, which is worth all the dramas Shakespeare ever wrote. In a few seconds more, one of the two actors will be dead. Which shall it be, the man or the bull? There they are alone, facing each other; the man has no defensive armour, he is dressed as if for a ball, in pumps and silk stockings, a pin could pierce his satin jacket; all he has is a bit of stuff and a frail sword. All the material advantages in this duel are on the side of the bull. He has terrible horns, sharp as poniards, immense impetus, the rage of a brute unconscious of danger; but the man has his sword and his courage, and twelve thousand glances fixed upon him; beautiful women will applaud him presently with their white hands.

The muleta was pulled aside, uncovering the matador's chest, the bull's horns were within an inch of it. I believed him lost. A silvery gleam flashed, swift as thought, between the two crescents, and the bull fell on his knees uttering a bellow of pain, with the sword-hilt between his shoulders, like Saint Hubert's stag which bore a crucifix between his antlers, as he is represented in Albert Dürer's marvellous engraving.

A whirlwind of applause swept over the amphitheatre; the nobility on the palcos, the middle classes on the gradas cubiertas, the manolos and manolas on the tendido, shouted and yelled, with true Southern ardour and excitement, "Bueno! bueno! viva el Barbero! viva!"

The blow just dealt by the espada is, as a matter of fact, very highly thought of and is called estocada a vuelapiés. The bull dies without losing a drop of blood, which is the highest point of the art, and falling on his knees seems to acknowledge his adversary's superiority. The dilettanti say that this stroke was invented by Joaquin Rodriguez, a famous torero of the last century.

When the bull is not slain at one blow, there springs over the fence a mysterious being dressed in black, who has heretofore taken no part in the fight. It is the cachetero. He advances furtively, watches the last convulsions of the animal, notices whether it may still pick itself up, which does happen sometimes, and treacherously strikes it from behind with a cylindrical poniard ending in a lancet, which cuts the spinal cord and destroys life with the rapidity of lightning. The correct place is behind the head, a few inches from the parting of the horns.

The military band played at the death of the bull ; one of the gates was opened, and four mules magnificently harnessed, all plumes, balls, and woollen tufts and little red and yellow flags — the Spanish colours — galloped into the arena. They were destined to remove the bodies, to which they are made fast by a rope and a hook. The horses were first dragged out, and then the bull. These four mules, with their dazzling and sonorous equipment, dragging over the sand at mad speed all those bodies which but now had galloped so well themselves, had a strange, wild aspect which helped to diminish the gloom of their functions. The attendant came up with a basketful of earth, and scattered it over the pools of blood in which the toreros might slip; the picadores resumed their places by the gate, the orchestra played a few bars, and another bull dashed into the arena; for there are no intervals to this spectacle, nothing stops it, not even the death of a torero. We have already said that the substitutes are standing by, dressed and armed, in case of accident.

We do not intend to relate in succession the slaying of the eight bulls which were sacrificed on that day, but we shall mention some variants and some incidents. The bulls are not always very fierce; some, indeed, are very gentle and ask nothing better than to lie quietly down in the shade; one can tell by their quiet, pleasant faces that they greatly prefer pasturage to the circus. They turn their backs upon the banderilleros, phlegmatically allow the chulos to wave their many-coloured mantles before their nose. Even the banderillas are not sufficient to dispel their apathy. Recourse is then had to violent means, to the banderillas de fuego. They are a sort of fireworks which light a few minutes after they have been planted in the shoulder of a cobarde (coward bull), and explode with much scattering of sparks and loud reports. This ingenious invention at once stuns, burns, and terrifies the bull; were he the coolest of bulls, he has got to get mad. He indulges in a multitude of extravagant leaps which one would not expect so heavy an animal to be capable of; he bellows, foams, and twists in every possible way to get rid of the irritating firework which burns its ears and roasts its hide.

It is true that the banderillas de fuego are made use of only as the very last resort; the fight is, to a certain extent, dishonoured if they have to be used; but if the alcalde delays too long the wave of his handkerchief, which is the signal, such a tumult arises that he is compelled to give in. It is impossible to describe the shouts and screams, the yells and the stamping. Some call out, "Banderillas de fuego!" others, "Perros! perros!" (Dogs! dogs!) The bull is loaded with insults; it is called a brigand, an assassin, a thief; it is offered a place in the shade; innumerable jokes are fired at it, often very witty ones. Soon a regular stick chorus helps out the shouting, which is insufficient. The floor of the palcos cracks and splits, and the painting falls from the ceilings in white particles like snow mixed with dust. Exasperation is at its height. "Throw the alcalde to the fire and to the dogs!" howls the maddened crowd, shaking its fist at the ayuntamiento's box. At last the wished-for permission is granted, and peace is restored.

Often the bull is so cowardly that even the banderillas de fuego are not sufficient. It returns to its querencia and refuses to come in. Then shouts of "Perros! perros!" are heard again. On a sign from the alcalde, the dogs are brought in. They are splendid, handsome thorough-breds, and of remarkable beauty. They charge straight at the bull, which may toss a dozen, but cannot prevent one or two of the strongest and boldest from fastening at last upon his ears. Once they have got hold, they are like leeches; you could rip them open before they would let go. The bull shakes its head, smashes them against the fences,—all is useless. When that has lasted for some time the espada or the cachetero drives his sword into the victim's side. The bull staggers, its knees give way, it falls to earth, and there it is despatched. Sometimes also a sort of instrument called media luna

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

(half-moon) is used to hamstring it, and thus it is rendered incapable of resistance; then it is no longer a fight, but a disgusting butchery. It often happens that the matador misses his blow; the sword strikes a bone and springs back, or else it enters the throat and causes the blood to flow freely, which is a serious blunder under the laws of bull-fighting. If the espada does not kill the animal with the second stroke he is hooted at, hissed, and insulted; for the Spanish public is impartial; it applauds the bull and the man according to their respective merits. If the bull rips up a horse and overthrows a man, "Bravo toro!" if it is the man who overthrows the bull, "Bravo torero!" but no cowardice is tolerated in man or brute. A poor devil who was afraid to drive the banderillas into an extremely fierce bull excited such a tumult that the alcalde had to promise to send the man to prison, before order could be restored.

In this same bull-fight Sevilla, who is an excellent horseman, was greatly applauded under the following circumstances. A bull of extraordinary strength got his horns under the horse's belly, and throwing up his head lifted the animal clean off the ground. Sevilla, in that perilous position, did not even move in his saddle, did not lose his stirrups, and held his horse in so firmly that it fell back on its four feet.

MADRID

The fight had been a good one; eight bulls and fourteen horses killed, and a chulo slightly wounded, — nothing better could have been asked for. Each bull-fight brings in about twenty to twenty-five thousand francs. The money is granted by the Queen to the main hospital, where the wounded toreros are most carefully tended. A priest and a doctor are ready in one of the rooms of the Plaza de Toros, the one to care for the soul, the other for the body. Formerly a mass on behalf of the toreros was said during the bull-fight; I believe this is still the case. You see that nothing is forgotten, and that the directors are careful men. When the last bull is slain, everybody jumps into the arena to look at it, and the spectators withdraw, discussing the merits of the different suertes and cogidas which have most impressed them.

And what about the women? you ask. Are they pretty? I must own that I do not know. I have a faint idea that there were some very pretty women near me, but I could not swear to it.

Let us go to the Prado to settle this important point.

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

---

When Madrid is spoken of, the very first things one thinks of are the Prado and the Puerta del Sol. The Prado, which has several avenues and sidewalks with a driveway in the centre, is shaded by low trees with cut tops. Each of them stands in a small, brick-edged basin with gutters through which water is led to the tree at the regular watering hours. But for this precaution they would soon be destroyed by the dust and burned up by the sun. The Prado begins at the Convent of Atocha, passes in front of the Atocha and Alcala Gates, and ends at the Recollet Gate; but the fashionable world keeps to a space bounded by the fountain of Cybele on the one hand and that of Neptune on the other, between the Alcala Gate and the Calle San Geronimo. In that part there is a wide space called el Salon, bordered with chairs like the main walk of the Tuileries; on either side of the Salon there is an avenue which bears the name of Paris. It is the rendezvous of the fashionable society of Madrid, and as fashionable society is not usually distinguished for fondness for the picturesque, the dustiest, least shaded, least convenient place in the whole promenade has been chosen. The crowd is so great in this narrow space hemmed in between the

MADRID

Salon and the driveway that it is often difficult to pull one's handkerchief out of one's pocket ; you must walk in step and follow your leader. The one reason which can have led to the adoption of this place is that every day you can see and bow to the people who drive past, and it is always an honour to a foot-passenger to bow to some one in a carriage. The equipages are not very fine. Most of them are drawn by mules, whose black coats, pot bellies, and pointed ears have a most unpleasant effect. They look like mourning carriages, driven behind a hearse. Even the Queen's carriage is exceedingly simple and commonplace ; an Englishman of wealth would unquestionably despise it. Of course there are some exceptions, but they are rare. The handsome Andalusian saddle-horses on which the Madrid fops show off are very handsome. There is no animal more elegant, more noble-looking, and more graceful than an Andalusian stallion, with its handsome plaited mane, and its long, thick tail, which sweeps the ground, its harness adorned with red tufts, its straight head, its brilliant eye, and its neck curved like a pigeon's breast. I saw one ridden by a lady, which was pink (I mean the horse, not the lady), as pink as a Bengal rose silvered over, of marvellous beauty.

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

The appearance of the Prado is really most animated, and it is one of the finest promenades in the world, not for its position, which is exceedingly ordinary in spite of all the efforts which Charles III made to correct its defects, but on account of the amazing crowd which collects there every evening from half-past seven until ten o'clock.

There are very few women's bonnets to be seen on the Prado, save a few yellow ones (straw hats); mantillas alone are worn. So the Spanish mantilla does actually exist! It is made either of black or of white lace, more usually of black, and it is worn behind the head above the comb. A few flowers placed by the temple complete this head-dress, which is the most delightful that can be imagined. A woman who wears the mantilla must be as ugly as the three theological virtues if she cannot manage to appear pretty. Unfortunately, that is the only portion of the Spanish costume which has been preserved; the rest is in the French fashion. The folds of the mantilla wave over a shawl, an odious shawl, and the shawl itself is worn over a dress of some sort of stuff which in no wise recalls the Spanish beauties. The former costume was so thoroughly appropriate to the type of beauty, and especially to the habits, of the Spanish women, that it is really the only one possible for them. The fan which they carry somewhat corrects their Parisian aspirations; a woman without a fan is a thing I have not seen in this blessed country; I have seen some who wore satin shoes without any stockings, but they had a fan. They carry a fan everywhere, even to church, where you meet with groups of women of all ages, kneeling, or squatting on their heels, praying and fanning most fervently, with Spanish signs of the cross much more complicated than ours, executed by them with a precision and a rapidity worthy of a Prussian soldier. The way to use a fan is wholly unknown in France. Spanish women excel in it. Their fingers open, close, and turn the fan so quickly, so lightly that a prestidigitator could not surpass them. Some of the richer ladies have collections of fans worth a great deal of money. We saw one which contained more than a hundred fans in different styles; they had come from every country and belonged to all times; they were in ivory, tortoise-shell, sandalwood; they were spangled; they were adorned with water-colours of the time of Louis XIV and Louis XV; there were some in Japanese and Chinese rice-paper; several were studded with rubies, diamonds, and other precious gems. For a pretty woman this is a luxury in good taste and a charming fad. The fans as they close and open make a little ruffling sound which, repeated more than a thousand times a minute, sends its peculiar note through the vague rumour and strikes a French ear as strange. When a woman meets an acquaintance, she makes a sign with her fan, and drops, as she goes by, the word agur. And now let us come to the Spanish beauties.

---

The Spanish type, as we understand it in France, does not exist in Spain, — at least I have not yet met with it. Usually when we speak of señoras and mantillas, we think of a long, pale, oval face, with great black eyes, velvety eyebrows; of a delicate, somewhat arched nose; lips red like pomegranates, and over all a warm, golden tone which bears out the line of the song, “She is golden as an orange.” That type is Arab or Moorish, not Spanish. The Madrileñas are charming in the fullest sense of the word. Three out of four are pretty, but they are in no wise such as we fancy them. They are short, dainty, well shaped, with small feet, handsome figures, and fairly full busts; but they are very white-skinned, their features small and irregular, and their cherry lips recalling exactly certain portraits of the time of the Regency. Many of them have light-brown hair, and you cannot walk up and down the Prado without meeting seven or eight fair-haired women of all degrees of fairness, from the palest blond to the most vehement red and the auburn of a Charles V. It is a mistake to think there are no fair women in Spain. Blue eyes are numerous, but are not thought so much of as black.

At first we found it somewhat difficult to reconcile ourselves to seeing women in low-necked dresses as if going to a ball, bare-armed, with satin slippers, and flowers in their hair and fan in hand, walking alone in a public place; for here ladies do not take a man's arm unless he is their husband or a near relative. Their escort walks by them, at least so long as it is day, for after nightfall the etiquette is less rigorous in this respect, especially for strangers who are not accustomed to it.

We had heard the manolas of Madrid very highly spoken of, but the manola as a type has disappeared, just as the grisette of Paris and the trasteverina of Rome; she still exists, but she has lost her old characteristics; she no longer wears her striking and picturesque costume; ignoble cotton prints have taken the place of the brilliant skirts embroidered in amazing designs; the hideous kid shoe has driven out the satin slipper, and, horrible to relate, the gown is fully two fingers longer. Formerly the manolas enlivened the aspect of the Prado with their quick gait and their striking costume, but it is now difficult to distinguish them from the wives of tradesmen and women of the lower middle class. I have sought for a thorough-bred manola in every corner of Madrid. I looked for her at the bull-fight, in the Delicias, at the Nuevo Recreo, at the festival of Saint Anthony, and I have only once come across a complete one. Once while traversing the Rastro quarter, after having stepped over a great number of rascals sleeping on the ground in rags, I found myself in a deserted lane, and there, for the first and last time, I beheld the wished-for manola. She was a tall, well made girl, some twenty-four years of age, which is the extreme age to which manolas and grisettes can attain. She had a bronzed complexion, a steady, sad look, somewhat thick lips, and something of African in the outline of her face. The huge plait of her hair, so black that it showed blue, tressed like the handle of a basket, was twisted around her head and was kept in place by a tall comb. Bunches of coral beads hung from her ears, her brown neck was adorned with a necklace of the same material. A black velvet mantilla covered her head and shoulders; her skirt, as short as that of the girls of Berne, was of embroidered cloth, and showed strong, well-made legs clad in black silk stockings; her shoes were the old-fashioned satin shoes; a red fan fluttered like a vermilion butterfly in her hands covered with silver rings. The last of the manolas turned the corner of the lane and disappeared from my sight, leaving me amazed at having seen once again walking in the real, living world, an opera dress. I also saw at the Prado some Santander pasiegas in their national costume. These pasiegas are said to be the best nurses in Spain, and their fondness for the children confided to them has become proverbial, just as in France the probity of the Auvergnat is proverbial. They wear a red cloth skirt with enormous heavy folds edged with a broad braid, a bodice of black velvet, also trimmed with gold, and by way of head-dress, a bandana in brilliant colours with numerous silver ornaments and other barbaric adornments. These women are very handsome, and have a very striking look of force and grandeur. The habit of cradling children in their arms makes them hold themselves in a way which shows off to good effect their handsome figures. To have a pasiega in her national costume is a sort of luxury comparable to that of a Klepht behind one's carriage.

---

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

---

M A D R I D

I have not spoken of the costumes of the men, but if you will look into the fashion-plates of six months ago, you will have a perfect idea of them.

There exists in Madrid a trade which is quite unknown in Paris, — that of water-sellers. Their stock in trade consists of a cantaro of white earthenware, a small basket of reeds or tin, which contains two or three glasses, a few azucarillos, which are sticks of porous caramel, and sometimes a couple of oranges or limes. Others have small breakers covered with foliage, which they carry on their back; a few even, along the Prado, for instance, have stalls surmounted with brass figures of Fame, and flags, which in no respect yield to the splendours of the liquorice-water sellers of Paris. These water-sellers are usually young Galician lads in snuff-coloured jackets, knee-breeches, and pointed hats. Some are Valencianos with white linen trousers, a piece of stuff laid over their shoulder, and blue-edged alpargatas. A few women and girls, in no costume to speak of, are also found in this business.

M A D R I D

According to their sex the water-sellers are called aguadores or aguadoras. You hear all over the town their sharp call, "Water, water; who wants water? Iced water, cool as snow!" You hear this sort of thing from five in the morning till ten at night. These calls suggested to Breton de los Herreros a song called "Aguadora," which was vastly popular all through Spain.

The Madrid thirst is really amazing. All the water of the fountains and all the snows of the Guadarrama Mountains would not suffice to slake it. The poor Manzanares and the dried-up urn of its naiads has been often laughed at, but I would like to know what any other river would look like in a city that is a prey to such a thirst. The Manzanares is drunk up at its source; the aguadores carefully watch for the least drop of water which they can find between its banks, and carry it off in their cantaros and their fountains; washerwomen wash the clothes with sand, and in the very centre of the river bed there is not enough water for a Mohammedan to perform his ablutions. A glass of water is sold for a cuarto (about a farthing). Next to water, what Madrid most needs is a light for its cigarette, and so the call, "Fuego, fuego!" is heard on all hands, and constantly mingles with the call, "Agua, agua!" It is an endless fight between the two elements, each trying to make the most noise. A fire more permanent than that of Vesta is carried by youngsters in small cups full of coal and fine ashes, provided with a handle to save burning one's fingers.

It is now half-past nine; the Prado is getting empty, and the crowd is moving in the direction of the cafés and botillerias which border the great Calle de Alcalá the other streets.

The Madrid cafés strike us, who are accustomed to the brilliant, fairy-like luxury of the Paris cafés, as regular twenty-fifth-rate public houses, while their decoration recalls vividly the caravans in which are exhibited bearded women and living sirens, but the lack of luxury is fully compensated for by the excellence and the variety of the refreshments served. We must confess that Paris, so superior in everything else, is behindhand in this respect; our art is, in this matter, in its infancy. The most famous cafés are, the Bolsa at the corner of Carretas Street; the Nuevo, where the exaltados meet; another, the name of which I have forgotten, which is the usual meeting-place of the Moderates, who are called Cangrejos or Crayfish;

M A D R I D

the Levante, close to the Puerta del Sol. I do not mean that the others are not good, but the above-mentioned are the most frequented. We must not forget either the Café del Principe, alongside of the theatre which bears the same name, and which is the usual rendezvous of artists and literary men.

Let us enter the Bolsa, which is adorned with small mirrors cut out on their lower surface so as to exhibit designs like those seen upon certain German glasses. Here is the list of bebidas heladas, of sherbets and quesitos. The bebida helada, or iced drink, is served in large or small glasses, and is to be had in great variety. There is the naranja (orange), limon (lemon), fresa (strawberry), and guindas (cherry). It is a sort of liquid ice, or snowy purée of most exquisite taste. The bebida de almendra blanca (white almonds) is a delightful drink unknown in France. The Madrid café also serves you with iced milk, half strawberry or cherry, which, while the body is being cooked in the torrid zone, makes your throat enjoy all the snows and cold of Greenland. During the day, when the ices are not yet ready, you can have agraz, a drink made of green grapes and served in very long-necked bottles; — the slightly acid taste of the agraz is exceedingly pleasant. Or you can drink a bottle of cerveza de Santa Barbara con limon, but this takes some little time to prepare. First are brought a basin and a large spoon like a punch-ladle, then the waiter approaches, bearing the wire-fastened bottle, which he uncorks with infinite precaution, and the beer is poured into the basin, into which has been previously put a decanter full of lemonade; the mixture is then stirred with the ladle, the glass is filled, and the drink is ready. If you do not care for this combination, all you have to do is to go into one of the orchaterias de chufas, usually kept by Valencians. The chufa is a small berry, a sort of almond, which grows in the neighbourhood of Valencia, which is roasted and ground, and of which a drink is made which is exquisite, especially when mixed with snow. This is an extremely refreshing drink.

To wind up what we have to say about the cafés, let us add that the sherbets differ from the French ones in being thicker. The quesito is a small, hard ice-cream moulded in the shape of a cheese. There are all sorts of them, apricot, pine-apple, orange, just as in Paris. Chocolate, coffee, and other spumas are also served. These are varieties of whipped cream, iced and exceedingly light, sometimes powdered with very finely ground cinnamon, and served with barquillos or rolled wafers, through which you take your bebida as through a siphon, drawing it in slowly by one of the ends, — a little bit of refinement which enables you to enjoy longer the coolness of the drink. Coffee is not served in cups, but in glasses. For the matter of that, it is little used. These details may appear to you somewhat fastidious, but if you were suffering, as we are, from a heat of eighty degrees and more you would consider them most interesting.

Many more women are to be seen in the Madrid cafés than in the Paris ones, although cigarettes, and even Havana cigars are smoked there. The newspapers most frequently met with are the Eco del Comercio, the Nacional and the Diario, which tell you of the festivals of the day, the hours of masses and sermons, the temperature, lost dogs, young peasant-women who are looking for positions as nurses, criadas who are looking for a situation, etc., etc.

But it is striking eleven, it is time for us to withdraw. There are but a very few belated passers-by in the Calle de Alcalá. The serenos, with their lanterns at the end of a pike and their stone-gray cloaks and their cadenced cry, are alone seen in the streets. No sound is heard but that of a choir of crickets singing together, in their little cages adorned with glasswork, their dissyllabic complaint. The Madrid people are very fond of crickets; every house has one suspended from the window in a miniature cage of wood or wire. They are also strangely fond of quails, which are kept in open-worked willow baskets, and which pleasantly vary, with their everlasting piu, piu, piu, the creak, creak of the crickets.

The Puerta del Sol is not, as might be imagined, a gate, but a church façade painted pink and adorned with a dial lighted at night, and with a great sun with golden beams, whence it derives its name. In front of the church there is a sort of a square, traversed in its greater length by the Calle de Alcalá, and crossed by the Calle de Carretas and de Montera. The Post Office, a great square building, faces on the square. The Puerta del Sol is the rendezvous of the idlers of the city, and they appear to be numerous, for early in the morning the crowd is dense there.

Politics form the general subject of conversation. The theatre of war is in every one's mind, and more strategy is devised at the Puerta del Sol than on all the fields of battle and in all the campaigns in the world. Formerly, and even to-day, the nobility would go into the shops near the Puerta del Sol, have a chair brought out, and remain there the greater portion of the day, talking with their clients, to the great dissatisfaction of the tradesman, grieved at such a mark of familiarity.

Now let us wander at haphazard through the city, for chance is our best guide; the more so that Madrid does not possess many architectural attractions, and one street is as interesting as another.

The houses of Madrid are built of laths and brick, and of clay, except the door-posts, the binding-courses, and the bearing-pieces, which are sometimes of blue or gray granite; the whole wall being carefully lined and painted in rather fantastic colours, apple-green, ash-blue, light-fawn, canary-yellow, rose-pink and other more or less anacreontic shades. The framework of the windows is ornamented with sham architectural work, numberless volutes, spirals, cupids, and flower-pots, and provided with Venetian blinds with broad white and blue stripes, or mats which are kept watered for the sake of the humidity and the coolness. Wholly modern houses are simply whitewashed or tinted like Paris ones. The projecting balconies and miradores somewhat break the monotony of straight lines and diversify the naturally flat aspect of the buildings, every relief on which is painted and treated in the style of theatre decorations. Light up all this with a brilliant sunshine, place here and there in these streets filled with light a few long-veiled señoras who hold their open fan against their cheek by way of a parasol, a few tanned, wrinkled beggars draped in tinder-coloured rags, a few Bedouin-looking, half-naked Valencianos; erect among the roofs the little, dwarf cupolas, the bulging, leaden-ball-topped spires of a church or a convent,—and you have a rather curious prospect which would prove to you that you are no longer on the rue Lafitte, and that you have really left the boulevard asphalt, even if you had not already been convinced of the fact by the sharp pebbles of the Madrid pavements which cut your feet.

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

A really striking thing is the frequent repetition of the inscription “Juego de villar,” which recurs every twenty yards. Lest the reader should imagine there is anything mysterious in these three words, I hasten to translate them. They simply mean “Billiards.” I cannot see what is the use of so many billiards. Next to juegos de villar, the most frequent inscription is despacho de vino (wine shop). In these shops are sold Val-de-peñas and other good wines. The confiterias and pastelerias are also very numerous and prettily decorated. Spanish preserves deserve particular mention. Those known as angel's hair are exquisite. Pastry is also as good as it can be in a country which has no butter, or at least, where it is so costly and so poor that it cannot well be used. It is much of the sort that we call fancy biscuits.

All the inscriptions are written in abbreviated characters, with the letters interlaced one in another, making it therefore difficult at first for strangers, who are great readers of signs, to make them out.

The houses are uncommonly large and commodious, the ceilings are high, and space is nowhere economised; some of the staircases here would hold a whole Paris house. Long suites of rooms have to be traversed before reaching the really inhabited part; for all these rooms are furnished only with a coat of white-wash or a flat yellow or blue tint, with coloured lines and panels imitating wood-work. Smoky and blackened paintings representing the beheading or the ripping up of some martyr — favourite subjects of the Spanish painters —

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

---

are hung upon the walls, most of the paintings being unframed and wrinkled. Wooden floors are unknown in Spain; at least, I have never seen any. All the rooms are floored with bricks, but as the bricks are covered with rush mattings in winter and reed mats in summer, the inconvenience is greatly diminished. The mats are plaited with much taste; the natives of the Philippines or the Sandwich Islands could not do better. There are three things which are for me an accurate test of the state of civilisation of a country: its pottery, the art of plaiting either willow or straw, and the method of harnessing draught animals. If the pottery is fine, of good shape, as correct as antique pottery, with the natural tone of the yellow or red clay; if the baskets and mats are fine and skilfully woven and adorned with coloured arabesques well chosen; if the harness is embroidered, pinked, adorned with bells, tufts of wool and designs of the finest kind, you may be quite sure that the nation is still primitive and very close to a state of nature, for civilised people do not know how to make a pot, a mat, or a harness. At this very moment I have in front of me, hanging from a pillar by a string, a jarra in which my drinking water is cooling. It is an earthen pot worth twelve

---

cuartos, that is, about three pence. The design is exquisite, and I know nothing to compare with it next to Etruscan. The top, which flares, forms a four-leaved clover slightly hollowed, so that the water can pour out in whichever way the vase is turned: the handles, ribbed, with a small moulding, run with perfect elegance into the neck and sides, which are of most satisfactory outline. Fashionable people prefer to these charming vases hideous pot-bellied, paunchy, dwarfed English pots, covered with a thick layer of glaze, which might be easily mistaken for jack-boots polished white. But talking of pots and potteries, we have got a pretty long way from the description of the house. We had better return to it without delay.

The little furniture which is to be met with in Spanish houses is in hideous taste, and recalls the Messidor and the Pyramid styles. The Empire style flourishes here in all its integrity; you come across mahogany pilasters, ending in sphinxes' heads in green bronze, or Pompeian wreaths, which have long since disappeared from the civilised world. There is not a single piece of carved wood furniture, not a single table inlaid in mother of pearl, not a single lacquered cabinet, — nothing. Old Spain has entirely disappeared; there is nothing left of it but a few Persian carpets and a few damask curtains. On the other hand, there is an amazing abundance of straw chairs and sofas; the walls are painted to represent columns or cornices, or daubed all over in distemper; on the tables and whatnots are placed little china or porcelain figures representing troubadours and other equally ingenious subjects, — which, however, are entirely obsolete, — poodles made of spun glass, electroplate candlesticks with tapers, and a hundred other magnificent things which it would take too long to describe, — even if I had not said enough about them. I have not the courage to speak of the hideous coloured engravings which pretend, though wrongly, to embellish the walls. There may be some exceptions, but they are not numerous. Do not imagine that the dwellings of people of the higher classes are furnished with greater taste or richness; these descriptions, which are scrupulously exact, apply to the houses of people who keep carriages and eight or ten servants.

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

The blinds are always closed, the shutters half shut, so that the rooms are filled with a sort of dim light which you have to become accustomed to in order to discern objects, especially when you come in from outside. The people in the room can see perfectly well, but those who enter are blind for eight or ten minutes, especially when one of the anterooms is lighted. It is said that skilful female mathematicians have ascertained by calculation that this optical combination results in perfect security for an intimate tête-à-tête in an apartment thus arranged.

The heat in Madrid is excessive. It comes on suddenly without the transition of spring, so that in speaking of the temperature of Madrid, people say that it has three months of winter and nine months of hell. It is impossible to protect one's self from this rain of fire save by keeping in low rooms which are almost wholly darkened and in which coolness is kept up by continuous watering. This need of coolness has given rise to the use of bucaros, a quaint and wild refinement which would not be pleasant to our fashionable French ladies, but which strikes the handsome Spanish women as in the very best taste.

Bucaros are a sort of pots of American red earth, very much like that of which the bowls of Turkish pipes are made. They are to be had in all sorts of shapes and sizes ; some are adorned with gilt lines and coarsely painted flowers scattered over the surface. As they are no longer made in America, bucaros will become rare, and in a few years will be as hard to find as old Sèvres china ; — then everybody will have them.

Seven or eight bucaros are placed on the marble tops of tables or in corners. They are then filled with water, and you sit down on the sofa to wait the effect which they produce and to enjoy the pleasure thereof with suitable tranquillity. The clay takes on a darker tint, the bucaros begin to sweat and to shed a perfume much resembling the odour of wet plaster or of a damp cellar which has been shut up for a long time. The bucaros perspire so abundantly that in an hour's time half the water is evaporated. What is left is as cold as ice and has a well or cistern taste which is rather disagreeable, but which connoisseurs consider delicious. Half a dozen bucaros are sufficient to make the air in a parlor so humid that you feel it as you enter. It is a sort of cold vapour bath. Not content with breathing its perfume and drinking the water, some people chew small fragments of the bucaros and then swallow them.

I have been to some evening parties or tertulias. There is nothing noteworthy about them. People dance to the accompaniment of pianos as they do in France, but in a still more modern and lamentable fashion, if that be possible. I cannot understand why people who dance so little should not make up their minds not to dance at all; it would be simpler and quite as amusing. The fear of being accused of indulging in the bolero, fandango, or cachucha makes women perfectly motionless. Their costume is very simple in comparison with that of the men, who are always dressed like fashion-plates. I noticed the same thing at the palace de Villa Hermosa, at the performance for the benefit of foundlings, where were the Queen Mother and the young Queen, and all the great world of Madrid. Ladies who were duchesses twice over and marchionesses four times over, wore dresses which a milliner going to spend the evening with a seamstress in Paris would absolutely condemn. They have forgotten how to dress in the Spanish fashion, and they have not yet learned how to dress in the French, and if they were not uncommonly pretty, they would often run the risk of being ridiculous. Once only, at a ball, did I see a lady wearing a rose satin waist adorned with five or six rows of black lace, like that of Fanny Elssler in the "Devil on Two Sticks,"—but she had been to Paris, where the Spanish costume had been revealed to her.

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

The tertulias are not very costly for the entertainers. Refreshments are conspicuous by their absence; there is neither tea, nor ices, nor punch; only, on a table in an outer room are ranged a dozen glasses of water, perfectly limpid, with a plate of azucarillos; but it would be thought indiscreet and gluttonous if any one were to be so luxurious as to put sugar in the water. This is the way in the richest houses, not through miserliness, but simply because it is the custom; besides, the hermit-like sobriety of the Spaniards is quite satisfied with this regimen.

As for manners, it is not in six weeks that one can understand the character of a people and the customs of society; novelty gives you impressions which a longer stay is apt to efface. It seemed to me the women in Spain enjoyed greater liberty than elsewhere; the behaviour of men in their presence seemed to me very mild and submissive. They pay their duties with scrupulous exactitude and punctuality, and express their passion by verses in all metres, rimed, assonanced, *suelto*s, and others. From the moment that they have placed their heart at the feet of a beauty, they may no longer dance except with great-grandmothers; they may talk only with ladies of fifty of unquestioned ugliness; they may no longer pay visits to houses where there is any young woman. A most assiduous visitor disappears suddenly, and returns in six months or a year; his mistress had forbidden him to go to that house; he is received just as if he had called the day before; it is perfectly understood. So far as may be judged at first sight, Spanish women are not capricious in love, and the connections they form often last several years.

The Teatro del Principe is rather conveniently arranged. Dramas, saynètes and intermedes are played there. I saw the performance of a play by Don Antonio Gil y Zarate, "Don Carlos el Heschizado," composed quite in the Shakespearean style. Don Carlos is very like Louis XIII in "Marion de Lorme," and the prison scene with the monk is a copy of the visit of Claude Frollo to Esmeralda in the cell where she is awaiting death. Fairy pieces with dances and spectacular entertainments are also performed at this theatre. I have seen given, under the title of "La

Pata de Cabra” an adaptation of “The Sheep’s Trotter,” formerly played at the Odéon. The ballet part was remarkably poor. The best dancers were not as good as the mere substitutes at the Opéra; on the other hand, the supernumeraries displayed extraordinary intelligence; the dance of the Cyclops was performed with remarkable precision and accuracy. As for the national dance, it does not exist. At Vitoria and Burgos and Valladolid we were told that the good dancers were in Madrid; in Madrid we were told that the real dancers of the cachucha were to be found only in Andalusia, at Seville; but we are very much afraid that to have Spanish dances we shall have to go back to Fanny Elssler and the Noblet sisters. Dolores Serra, who made such a sensation in Paris, where we were among the first to draw attention to the passionate boldness, the voluptuous suppleness, and the sparkling grace which characterised her dancing, has appeared several times on the Madrid stage without producing the least effect, so completely has the feeling for and the understanding of the old national dances disappeared from Spain. When the jota aragonesa, or the bolero is performed, all the best people rise and go out; the strangers and the rabble, in whom the poetic instinct always lasts longer, alone remain.

The Queen's palace is a large, very square and solid building, of fine dressed stone, with a great many windows, an equal number of doors, and a great many Ionic columns, Doric pilasters,—in a word, all that goes to make up a monument of bad taste. The vast terraces which support it and the snow-clad mountains of Guadarrama against which it stands out relieve the monotony and vulgarity of its outline. Velasquez, Maella, Bayeu, and Tiepolo have painted fine ceilings in more or less allegorical taste. The great staircase is very handsome, and Napoleon preferred it to that of Versailles.

The Parliament house is adorned with a mixture of Paestum columns and periwigged lions in most abominable taste; I do not believe that good laws can possibly be passed in the midst of such architecture. Near the Parliament House rises in the middle of the square a bronze statue of Miguel Cervantes. No doubt it is praiseworthy to erect a statue to the immortal author of Don Quixote, but they ought to have made it a good deal better.

The monument to the victims of the Dos de Mayo is situated on the Prado not far from the Museum of Fine Arts. On catching sight of it, for a moment I fancied I was back on the Place de la Concorde in Paris, and I saw in a strange mirage the venerable obelisk of Luxor, which until now I had not suspected of travelling around. It is a sort of small pillar of gray granite surmounted by an obelisk of reddish granite, very similar in tone to that of the Egyptian needle. The effect is rather fine and has a certain venerable gravity. It is to be regretted that the obelisk is not in one piece. The inscriptions in honour of the victims are engraved in gold lettering on the sides of the pedestal. The Dos de Mayo is a heroic and glorious episode which the Spaniards dwell on rather too much; engravings and pictures of it are to be met with everywhere.

The Armeria does not come up to one's anticipations. The Artillery Museum in Paris is far richer and more complete. The Madrid Armeria contains very few complete suits of armour composed of pieces of the same epoch. There are helmets older or later than the breastplates upon which they are placed. The reason given for this discrepancy is that when the French invasion occurred, these curious relics were concealed in attics, and that there they were mixed up without its being possible to collect them afterwards and to sort them with anything like accuracy. So no trust is to be placed in the statements of the custodians. We were shown, as being the coach of Mad Joan, the mother of Charles V, a carriage of carved wood admirably wrought, which evidently was not earlier than the time of Louis XIV. The carriage of Charles V, with its leather cushions and curtains, was much more likely to be authentic. There are very few Moorish weapons, — two or three old bucklers and a few yataghans. The most interesting things are the embroidered saddles starred with gold and silver, covered with steel, but nothing certain is known as to the date of their manufacture or as to their original owners. The English admire greatly a sort of triumphal cab in wrought iron presented to Ferdinand in 1823 or 1824.

We may mention as we pass on a few fountains in a most corrupt, but rather amusing rococo style; the Toledo Bridge, in very bad taste, very rich and very much ornamented, with perfume-burners, fruit, and foliage; a few curiously painted churches surmounted with Muscovite steeples; and then go on to the Buen

Retiro, the royal residence, situated at a short distance from the Prado. We Frenchmen, who possess Versailles and Saint Cloud, and who possessed Marly, are rather difficult to please in the way of royal residences. The Buen Retiro appears to be the realisation of a well-to-do grocer's dream. It has a garden filled with ordinary, but showy flowers; small basins adorned with rockery and vermiculated stones, with jets of water, in the style of those seen in the shop windows of provision dealers; ponds of greenish water on which float wooden swans painted white and varnished, and other wonders in most mediocre taste. The natives go into ecstasies in front of a rustic pavilion built of round logs, the interior of which has the pretension of being Hindoo in character. The artless patriarchal Turkish garden with its kiosk, the windows of which are glazed with coloured glass and through which you see blue, red, or green landscapes, is far superior in the way of taste and magnificence. There is, above all, a certain chalet which is the most ridiculous and comical thing imaginable. Near the chalet is a stable, provided with a stuffed goat and kid, and a sow of gray stone which is suckling little pigs of the same material. A short distance farther the guide steps aside, mysteriously opens a door, and when he calls you and at last permits you to come in you hear a dull sound of wheels and counterweights, and you find yourself in the presence of hideous automata which are churning butter, spinning, or rocking with their wooden feet wooden children laid in carved cradles. In the next room is the grandfather, who is ill in bed; his potion is near him on the table. This is an exact summary of the chief splendours of the Retiro. A fine bronze equestrian statue of Philip V, which in general appearance resembles the statue of the Place des Victoires, somewhat atones for all this wretchedness.

The Madrid Museum, which it would take a whole volume to describe, is exceedingly rich. There is an abundance of Titians, Raphaels, Veroneses, Rubens, Velasquez, Riberas, and Murillos. The paintings are remarkably well lighted, and the architecture, especially in the interior, is in rather good style. The façade on the Prado is in bad taste, but on the whole the building does honour to the architect, Villa Nueva, who drew the plans. Having visited the Museum, you ought to go next to the Natural History Museum to see the mastodon or Dinotherium giganteum, a marvellous fossil with bones like bars of brass, which must be at the very least the behemoth of the Bible; a nugget of virgin gold of the weight of sixteen pounds, Chinese gongs, the sound of which, no matter what people say, is very much like that of a copper stewpan when you kick it, and a series of paintings representing all the varieties which can result from the crossing of the white, black, and copper-coloured races. Do not forget either to see at the Academy three admirable paintings by Murillo, the Foundation of Santa Maria Maggiore (two different subjects), and Saint Elizabeth of Hungary healing the sick; two or three splendid Riberas; a Burial by el Greco, some portions of which are worthy of Titian; a fantastic sketch also by el Greco, representing monks performing penance, which surpasses the most mysteriously gloomy conceptions of Lewis or of Anne Radcliffe; and a charming woman in Spanish costume, lying on a divan, painted by good old Goya, the national painter above all others, who seems to have come into this world on purpose to collect the last traces of the national customs which are about to disappear. Francisco Goya y Lucientes is unmistakably the descendant of Velasquez. After him come Aparicio and Lopez, — the decadence is complete, the cycle of art is closed. To whom shall it be given to reopen it?

Goya, a strange painter and a singular genius! No man was ever more markedly original, no Spanish artist was ever more thoroughly local. A sketch by Goya, four touches of the graver in a cloud of aqua tinta, tells you more about the manners of the country than the longest description. Goya seems to belong to the finest periods of art by his adventurous air, his force, and his numberless talents, and yet he is almost a contemporary, for he died at Bordeaux in 1828.

The old Spanish art was buried with Goya, as was the forever vanished world of toreros, majos, monks, smugglers, robbers, alguaciles, and witches — all the local colour of the Peninsula. He came just in time to collect and immortalise it. He thought he was merely drawing caprices; what he drew was the portrait and the history of old Spain, though he believed he was serving the new ideas and beliefs. Soon his caricatures will have become historical monuments.

THE ESCORIAL

THE Escorial is situated seven or eight leagues from Madrid, not far from the Guadarrama, at the foot of a mountain chain. It is impossible to imagine anything more barren and desolate than the district in which it lies. Not a tree, not a house is there on it; great overlapping slopes, dry ravines, known to be torrent beds by the bridges which span them here and there, and clumps of blue mountains snow-capped or cloud-laden. The landscape, nevertheless, does not lack grandeur; the absence of vegetation imparts extraordinary severity and clearness to its lines. The farther one goes from Madrid, the larger do the stones which are scattered over the countryside become, approaching almost to the dimensions of rocks. They are of a grayish blue, and strewing the rough soil they look like the warts upon the back of a hundred-year-old crocodile. They show like innumerable quaint towers against the silhouette of the hills, which themselves resemble the ruins of gigantic buildings. About half-way out stands, at the top of a rather sharp hill, a wretched, lonely house, the only one to be met with on a stretch of twenty-four miles. Opposite to it is a spring which yields, drop by drop, clear, ice-cold water. You drink as many glasses of that water as you find, the mules are breathed, and then the coach starts again. Soon afterwards you perceive, standing out against the hazy background of the mountains, lighted up by a brilliant ray of sunshine, the Escorial, a leviathan of architecture. The effect from afar is exceedingly fine; it looks like a vast Oriental palace; the stone capitals and the balls which top every pinnacle greatly conduce to that illusion. Before reaching it you traverse a great wood of olive trees adorned with crosses curiously perched upon most picturesque huge boulders.

At the end of the wood you enter the village, and are face to face with the colossus, which, like all colossi, loses a great deal by nearness. The first thing which struck me was the vast number of swallows and martins which circled in the air in innumerable swarms, uttering sharp, piercing cries. The poor little birds seemed terrified by the deadly silence which broods over this Thebaïd, and endeavoured to impart sound and animation to it.

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

It is well known that the Escorial was built in fulfilment of a vow made by Philip at the siege of Saint Quentin, when he was obliged to bombard the Church of Saint Laurence. He promised the saint to compensate him for the church which he had destroyed by building another larger and finer, and he kept his word better than the kings of the earth usually do. The Escorial, begun by Juan Bautista, completed by Herrera, is unquestionably, next to the pyramids of Egypt, the most enormous heap of granite on earth. In Spain it is called the eighth wonder of the world. As every country has its eighth wonder, there must be at least thirty eighth wonders.

I am greatly puzzled to state my opinion of the Escorial. Yet, on my soul and conscience, I cannot help thinking it the ugliest and gloomiest monument which an ambitious monk and a suspicious tyrant could possibly devise for the mortification of their fellow-men. I am well aware that the purpose of the Escorial is austere and religious, but gravity is not necessarily coldness, and melancholy is not necessarily emaciation; recollection is not weariness, and beauty of form may always be happily wedded to novelty of thought.

The Escorial is planned in the shape of a gridiron, in honour of Saint Laurence. Four square towers represent the feet of the instrument of torture, the connecting buildings form the framework, other transverse buildings simulate the bars; the palace and the church are built in the handle. This curious notion, which must have given much trouble to the architect, is not readily perceived, although it is very plain on the plan, and were one not informed of it beforehand, it would certainly escape notice. I do not blame this puerile symbolism, which is entirely in the taste of the age, for I am convinced that specific directions, far from being an obstacle to an artist of genius, aid and sustain him, and lead him to discover resources which otherwise he would not have thought of; but it seems to me that something much more effective might have been worked out. People who are fond of good taste and sobriety in architecture will think the Escorial perfect, for the only line employed in it is a straight line, and the only order is the Doric order, which is the barest of them all. A disagreeable early impression is caused by the yellow-earth colour of the walls, which might be mistaken for clay walls, did not the joints of the stones, brought out by staring white lines, prove

---

the contrary. Nothing can be more monotonous than these six or seven story buildings, without mouldings, pilasters, or cornices, with small, low windows, which look like the holes in a beehive. It is an ideal barracks and hospital. Its only merit is that it is in granite, — a wasted merit, since a hundred yards off it can be mistaken for clay. On top of all is a heavy dwarfed cupola, which I cannot compare to anything better than the dome of the Val-de-Grâce, and which for sole ornament boasts a multitude of granite balls. All around, in order that the symmetry may be in no wise diminished, monuments have been built in the same style, — that is to say, with a multitude of small windows and with no ornamentation. These buildings have been joined together by bridge-like galleries thrown across the streets which lead to the village, now but a heap of ruins.

The ground around the monument is flagged with granite, and the boundaries are marked by low three-foot walls adorned with the inevitable balls at every angle and opening. The façade, which does not project in the least from the main body of the monument, makes, therefore, no break upon the bareness of the lines and is scarcely noticeable, though it is gigantic.

You enter first into a vast court, at the end of which rises a church portal, noticeable only for its colossal statues of prophets, its gilded ornaments, and its rose-painted figures. The court is flagged, damp, and cold; grass grows in the corners; as you step into it weariness presses down upon you like a leaden cope; your heart sinks, and you feel as if there were an end of all things and joy were forever dead to you. You have not gone twenty steps from the gate, when you smell a faint, icy, savourless odour of holy water and funeral vault, wafted by a current of air laden with pleurisy and catarrh. Although the thermometer stands at eighty degrees outside, you are chilled to the marrow and feel as if never again would life warm in your veins, your blood, turned colder than serpent's blood. The walls, impenetrable as a tomb, do not allow the living air to filter through their vast thickness. Well, in spite of that cloister-like, Russian cold, the first thing I beheld on entering the church was a Spanish woman kneeling on the stones, who was beating her breast with her fist with one hand, and with the other fanning herself at least as fervently. The fan — I remember it perfectly — was of a water-green colour, which makes me shudder when I think of it.

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

The guide who piloted us through the interior of the edifice was blind, and it was really marvellous to see how accurately he stopped before the pictures, the subject and painter of which he named without ever making a mistake. He led us up into the dome, and made us wander through endless corridors, ascending and descending, which equal in their labyrinthine maze Anne Radcliffe's "The Confessional of the Black Penitents," or "The Castle of the Pyrenees."

The interior of the church is bare and cold. Huge, mouse-gray pillars of granite filled with grains of mica as coarse as kitchen salt, rise to the fresco-painted vaults, the azure and vaporous shades of which ill harmonise with the cold, wretched colours of the architecture. The retable, carved and gilded in Spanish fashion, and with very handsome paintings, somewhat compensates for the bareness of the decoration, in which everything is sacrificed to an insipid symmetry. The gilded bronze statues which kneel at the ends of the retable, and which represent, if I mistake not, Don Carlos and princesses of the royal family, are most effective and in a grand style. The chapter house, which is next the high altar, is in itself a vast church. The stalls, instead of blooming out into fantastic arabesques like those of Burgos, share the general rigidity and are merely decorated with small mouldings. We were shown the one in which sat for fourteen years the sombre Philip II, a king born to be a grand inquisitor. It is the corner stall. A door cut in the wood-work leads to the interior of the palace.

Without priding myself upon very profound devotion, I never enter a Gothic cathedral without feeling a mysterious and deep sensation, an extraordinary emotion, and without a vague fear that I shall meet around some cluster of pillars God the Father Himself, with his long silver beard, his purple mantle, and his azure gown, collecting within the folds of his robe the prayers of the faithful. In the church of the Escorial one is so overwhelmed, crushed, one is so thoroughly in the grasp of an inflexible and gloomy power, that the uselessness of prayer is plainly demonstrated. The God of such a temple can never be moved.

After having visited the church, we went down into the Pantheon, the name given to the crypt in which are deposited the bodies of the kings. It is an octagonal hall thirty-six feet in diameter and thirty-eight feet high, situated exactly under the high altar, so that the priest when saying Mass stands upon the keystone. It is reached by a staircase of granite and coloured marble closed by splendid bronze gates. The Pantheon is lined with jasper, porphyry, and other precious marbles. In the walls are cut niches with cippi of antique form intended to receive the bodies of the kings and queens who have left successors. The cold in this crypt is deadly and penetrating; the polished marble reflects the trembling rays of the torch; it seems to be dripping with water, and one could easily imagine himself in a submarine grotto. The weight of the vast edifice crushes you, surrounds, grips, and stifles you; you feel caught, as it were, in the tentacles of a gigantic granite polypus. The dead contained in the sepulchral urns seem more dead than others, and it is difficult to believe that they can ever be resurrected. Here, as in the church, the impression borne in upon one is of sinister despair. There is not in these gloomy vaults a single crack through which the glad heaven may be seen.

There are a few good paintings left in the sacristy, though the best of them have been transferred to the Royal Museum in Madrid. Among others there are two or three paintings of the German school on panels;

THE ESCORIAL

these are of rare merit. The ceiling of the great staircase was painted in fresco by Luca Giordano, and represents in allegory the vow of Philip II and the foundation of the convent. The acres of walls in Spain painted by Luca Giordano are fairly amazing, and it is difficult for us moderns, who are breathless before we have got through half the shortest task, to conceive how such work was possible. Pellegrino Tibaldi, Cambiaso, Carducci, Romulo, Cincinato, and several others have painted cloisters, tombs, and ceilings in the Escorial. The library ceiling, which is by Carducci and Pellegrino Tibaldi, is in a satisfactory, clear, luminous fresco tone; the composition is rich, the interlaced arabesques are in excellent taste. The Escorial library has this peculiarity, that the books are placed with their backs to the wall and the front towards the spectator. I do not know the reason for this. The library is especially rich in Arabic manuscripts, and must assuredly contain inestimable treasures wholly unknown. The remaining books struck me as being generally on theology and scholastic philosophy. We were shown some vellum manuscripts with illuminations and miniatures, but as it happened to be a Sunday and the librarian was absent, we could not see more, and we had to leave without seeing a single incunabulum.

In one of the corridors stands a life-size Christ in white marble attributed to Benvenuto Cellini, and a few very strange, fantastic pictures after the manner of Callot's and Teniers' "Temptation," but very much older. Nothing more monotonous, however, can be conceived than these gray granite corridors which wind through the building like veins in a human body; it takes a blind man to find his way through them. You go up and down, you turn constantly; it would not take more than three or four hours' walking there to wear out the soles of one's shoes, for the granite is rough as a file and as gritty as sand-paper. From the dome you see nothing but balls which from below appear the size of bells, but are of huge dimensions and could be turned into monstrous globes. The vast prospect is unrolled before you, and you embrace at a glance the whole district which separates you from Madrid. On the other side rise the Guadarrama mountains. From here you can see the whole plan of the monument; you look into the courts and cloisters with their rows of arcades rising one above another, with their fountains and their central pavilions. The roofs show saddle-wise, as in a bird's-eye view.

At the time we went up into the dome there was in a huge chimney-top, in a great nest of straw like an overturned turban, a stork with its three young chicks. This interesting family showed most quaintly against the sky. The hen stork stood upon one leg in the centre of the nest, its neck sunk in its shoulders, its beak majestically placed upon its tuft, like a meditating philosopher; the chicks stretched out their long beaks and necks asking for food. I hoped for a moment that I might witness one of those sentimental scenes told of in books on natural history, in which the great white pelican tears its breast to feed its young, but the stork seemed unmoved by these demonstrations of starvation. The melancholy group further increased the deep solitude of the place, and gave an Egyptian aspect to this vast building worthy of the Pharaohs. On coming down we saw a garden which contains more architecture than vegetation. It is composed of terraces and parterres of clipped boxwood laid out in designs like those on old damask, with a few fountains and a few greenish pools; a solemn, dull garden, worthy of the gloomy pile of which it forms a part.

It is said that there are eleven hundred windows on the exterior of the building alone, which makes the average tourist gape with astonishment. I did not count them; but it is not in the least improbable, for I have never seen so many windows together. The number of doors is equally fabulous.

I issued from that granite desert, that monkish necropolis, with an extraordinary sensation of satisfaction and lightness. I seemed to be reborn, to be capable of again becoming young, and to rejoice in God's creation, which I had lost all hope of doing within these funeral vaults. The warm, bright air enveloped me like a soft stuff of fine wool, and warmed my body, chilled by the cadaverous atmosphere. I was freed from that architectural nightmare, which I thought would never come to an end. I advise people who are foolish enough to imagine that they are bored, to go and spend three or four days in the Escorial; they will learn there what true weariness is, and they will enjoy themselves all the rest of their lives by merely thinking that they might be in the Escorial and that they are not.

TOLEDO

WE had exhausted the sights of Madrid, and were beginning to be somewhat bored ; so in spite of the great heat and all sorts of terrible stories about the rebels and the rateros, we bravely started for Toledo, the city of sword blades and romantic daggers.

Toledo is not only one of the oldest cities of Spain, but of the world, if the chroniclers are to be believed. The most staid among them place its foundation at a time anterior to the flood. Why should they not put it as far back as the pre-Adamite kings, a few years before the creation of the world? Others attribute the honour of its foundation to Tubal Cain, others again to the Greeks, others to Telmon and Brutus, Roman consuls, others to the Jews who entered Spain with Nebuchadnezzar and maintain their contention by the etymology of Toledo, which comes, they say, from toledoth, a Hebrew word which means generations, because the twelve tribes had helped to build and settle it. Whatever the truth may be, Toledo is certainly a wonderfully old city, situated some thirty-six miles from Madrid, — Spanish miles, of course, which are much longer than a twelve-column article or a day without money, the two longest things we know about. The trip is made in a calesa, or in a small mail-coach which starts twice a week. The latter is considered safer, for in Spain, as formerly in France, no one starts on the shortest trip without making his will. The fear of brigands must surely be exaggerated, for in the course of a very long pilgrimage through provinces having the reputation of being most dangerous, we have never met with anything which would justify this panicky terror.

You leave Madrid by the Toledo Gate and Bridge, both of which are adorned with flower-pots, statues, and chicory leaves in very poor taste, but produce nevertheless a rather majestic effect. You pass on the right the village of Caramanchel, whence Ruy Blas fetched for Mary of Neubourg the little blue German flower (Ruy Blas to-day would not find a trace of forget-me-nots in this cork-bark hamlet built upon a soil of pumice stone); and you enter, travelling upon a wretched road, an endless, dusty plain covered with corn and rye, the pale-yellow colour of which increases the monotony of the landscape. A few ill-omened crosses, which spread here and there their thin arms, a few steeples which indicate an unseen village, the dried bed of a torrent crossed by a stone arch, are the only breaks in this monotony. From time to time you meet a peasant on his mule, carbine by his side, a muchacho driving before him two or three asses laden with earthenware jars or bundles of straw tied with cords, or a poor, wan, sunburned woman, dragging a fierce-looking child,—that is all.

As we proceeded the landscape became barer and more desert-like, and it was with a feeling of secret satisfaction that we perceived upon a bridge of dry stone the five green light-cavalrymen who were to escort us, for an escort is needed in travelling from Madrid to Toledo.

We breakfasted at Illescas, a town in which there are some remains of old Moorish buildings, and where the windows of the houses are protected by complicated gratings surmounted by crosses.

Beyond Illescas the country becomes more hilly, and the road consequently more abominable. It is nothing but a succession of break-neck hills, which, however, do not prevent the pace from being fast; for Spanish postilions do not care a bit about what happens behind them provided they themselves get to their destination; even if they bring along the pole and the front wheels only, they are quite satisfied. However, we reached our destination without mishap, in a cloud of dust raised by our mules and the horses of our escort, and entered Toledo, devoured with curiosity and thirst, through a magnificent Arab gate with an elegant horse-shoe arch and granite pillars surmounted by balls and covered with verses of the Alkoran. The gate is called the Sun Gate. It is of a reddish, warm tone, like that of a Portugal orange, and its profile stands out admirably against a clear, lapis-lazuli sky. In our grayer climate we cannot have any conception of the virulence of colour and the sharpness of contour of these monuments, and the paintings which represent them always strike one as exaggerated.

---

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

After having passed the Puerta del Sol, you reach a sort of terrace from which you can enjoy a vast prospect, — the Vega, dappled and striped with trees and fields which are indebted for their greenness to the irrigation system introduced by the Moors. The yellow Tagus, crossed by the two bridges of Saint

Martin and the Alcantara, flows rapidly and almost wholly encloses the town in one of its windings. At the foot of the terrace sparkle the brown, shining roofs of the houses, and the steeples of the convents and churches, with their green and white tiles arranged checkerwise. Beyond are seen the reddish hills and the bare slopes which form Toledo's horizon. The prospect is peculiar in this, that it wholly lacks ambient air and the haze which in our climate always veils broad landscapes. The transparency of the air leaves the lines perfectly clean, and enables you to perceive the smallest hill at a considerable distance.

Our trunks having been inspected, we hastened to look for an inn. We were taken, through such narrow streets that two laden asses could not have gone through side by side, to the Fonda de los Caballeros, one of the most comfortable in the city. There, with the help of the few Spanish words we knew, and of pathetic pantomime, we succeeded in making the hostess—an intelligent and charming woman, most interesting and distinguished-looking—understand that we were starving.

The whole kitchen brigade got under way, the innumerable small jars in which are distilled and sub-

limited the spicy stews of Spanish cookery were placed on the fire, and we were promised dinner in an hour's time. We turned the time to account by examining the inn more closely. It was a handsome building, no doubt some old mansion, with an inner court paved with coloured marbles arranged in mosaic pattern, and ornamented with wells of white marble and troughs faced with tiles in which the glass ware and the jars are washed. The court is called a patio. It is usually surrounded by columns and arcades, with an artificial fountain in the centre. An awning, which is drawn up in the cool of the evening, forms the ceiling of this sort of outside drawing-room. Around the first story of the court runs an iron balcony, beautifully wrought, on which open the windows and doors of the apartments, which people use only to dress, eat, and sleep in. The rest of the time is spent in this open-air drawing-room, in which are placed pictures, chairs, sofas, and the piano, and which is brightened with pots of flowers and orange trees in boxes.

We had scarcely finished our examination, when we were informed that dinner was ready. It proved to be not bad. Having finished our meal, we proceeded to visit the city.

TOLEDO

---

The Toledo streets are excessively narrow. One might shake hands across them, and it would be the easiest thing in the world to step across from one balcony to the other, if the exceedingly beautiful gratings and charming bars in that superb iron-work which is lavished everywhere in Spain, did not interfere and prevent aerial familiarities. These narrow streets would cause an outcry among all the partisans of civilisation, for they only dream of immense open spaces, vast squares, extravagantly wide streets, and other more or less progressive embellishments; yet nothing is more sensible than a narrow street in a hot climate. At the bottom of these narrow lanes so wisely cut through the groups and islands of houses, one enjoys delightful shade and coolness. Of course my remark applies only to hot countries, where it never rains, where mud is unknown, and carriages are exceedingly rare. Narrow streets in our wet climate would be abominable cesspools. In Spain women go out on foot in black satin shoes and take long walks, which causes me to admire them, especially in Toledo, where the pavements are composed of small, sharp, polished, shining pebbles, which seem to have been carefully placed with the cutting edge up; but the well shod, firm little feet of the ladies are as hard as gazelles' hoofs, and they travel lightly over these diamond-pointed paving-stones which draw cries of anguish from a traveller accustomed to the soft asphalt.

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

The Toledo houses have an imposing and severe appearance. There are very few windows in the façades and they are usually grated. The doors, adorned with pillars of polished granite surmounted with balls, — a frequent form of ornamentation, — look thick and solid, an impression increased by constellations of huge nails. They recall, at one and the same time, convents, prisons, fortresses, and, indeed, harems, for the Moors have passed here. Some few houses, as a curious contrast, are coloured and painted externally in fresco or distemper, with imitation bassi-relievi monochromes, flowers, rockwork, and wreaths, with perfume-pans, medallions, Cupids, and all the mythological rubbish of the last century. These houses produce the quaintest and most comical effect among their sombre sisters of feudal or Moorish origin.

We were led through a labyrinth of small lanes, in which we had to walk in single file, to the Alcazar, situated, like a necropolis, at the highest point of the city. Built on the ruins of the old Moorish palace, the Alcazar itself is a ruin to-day, and it might be one of those remarkable architectural visions which Piranesi sought and realised in his magnificent etchings. It is by Covarrubias, a little known artist, but much superior to the dull and heavy Herrera, whose reputation is a great deal overdone.

The façade, adorned with a bloom of the purest Renaissance arabesques, is a masterpiece of noble elegance. The burning sun of Spain, which turns marble red and stone saffron, has coated it with rich and vigorous colours far different from the black leprosy which age imparts to our old buildings. As a great poet has said, "Time has passed his intelligent hand" over the edges of the marble, over the too rigid contours, and given to the sculpture, already so rich and undulating, the last touch and polish. I particularly recall the great staircase, very light in its elegance, with marble columns, pilasters, and steps, already half broken, leading to a door that opens on an abyss; for that portion of the building has fallen in. This superb staircase, which a king might inhabit and which leads to nothing, produces a strange and threatening effect.

The Alcazar is built upon a great esplanade surrounded by ramparts crenellated in Oriental fashion, from the top of which one enjoys the vast prospect and really wonderful panorama. On this side the cathedral sends up into heaven its lofty spire; farther away gleams in the sunshine the church of San Juan de los Reyes; the Alcazar Bridge, with its tower gate, spans the Tagus with bold arches; the Juanello Artificio fills up the river with its superposed arcades of red bricks, which might be mistaken for the remains of Roman constructions; and the massive towers of Cervantes' Casillo (this Cervantes has nothing in common with the author of Don Quixote), perched upon the rocky and shapeless cliffs which border the river, make still another break on an horizon already so strikingly varied by the crests of the mountains.

An exquisite sunset completed the picture. The sky by imperceptible gradations passed from the most brilliant red to orange, then to pale citron, and finally into a weird blue of the colour of greenish turquoise, which itself melted in the west into the lilac tints of night, the shadows of which already darkened the whole of that part.

Leaning on an embrasure of a crenellation and having a bird's-eye view of that city in which I knew not a soul, and where my name was utterly unknown, I fell into a deep meditation in the presence of all these shapes which I saw and probably would never again see. I began to doubt my own identity; I felt so far away from myself, carried to such a distance outside of my usual sphere that it all seemed to me a hallucination, a strange dream out of which I should start awake to the sharp, trembling strains of some vaudeville music as I sat in a theatre box. In spite of the magnificent prospect, I felt my soul filled with a mighty sadness; and yet I was realising the dream of my life; I was touching one of my most ardently caressed desires. I had spoken enough, in my fair youthful years of Romanticism, of my good Toledo blade, to be anxious to see the place where Toledo blades are made.

It took nothing less to draw me from my philosophical meditations than a proposal on the part of my friend that we should go and bathe in the Tagus. Now a bath is pretty rare in a country where in summer they have to fill up the rivers with water drawn from the wells; but on our guide asserting that the Tagus was a genuine stream and damp enough to enable one to swim in it, we hastened to descend from the Alcazar in order to profit by the lingering twilight, and went towards the river. We passed under a fine Arab gate with a brick arch, and reached the Alcantara Bridge, near which there was a spot suitable for bathing, reached by a winding, very steep path crawling along the rocks which enclose Toledo.

Having had our bath, we hastened back to re-enter the city before the gates were closed, enjoyed a glass of orchata de chufas and iced milk of most exquisite taste and bouquet, and were shown back to our fonda. Our room, like all Spanish rooms, was whitewashed and adorned with those dim, yellow paintings, those mystical daubs, painted like the signs of beer shops, which are so often met with in the Peninsula, the country of the world which contains the greatest number of wretched paintings.

The Cathedral of Toledo is accounted, and rightly, the finest and one of the richest of Spain. Its origin is lost in the mists of ages, but if the native authors are to be believed, it goes back to the Apostle Santiago, the first Bishop of Toledo, who indicated its site to his disciple and successor, Elpidius. Elpidius built a church on the spot and dedicated it to Saint Mary, while that divine lady was still living in Jerusalem.

The Blessed Virgin was not ungrateful, and, according to the same legend, came in person to visit the church in Toledo and brought with her own hands to Saint Ildefonso a beautiful chasuble made of heavenly linen. The chasuble is still in existence, and in the wall may be seen the stone upon which the divine foot was placed, the imprint of which it still bears.

This church existed up to the time of Saint Eugenius, sixth Bishop of Toledo, who enlarged and embellished it as much as his means allowed, under the title of Our Lady of the Assumption, which it bears to-day. In the year 200, at the time of the cruel persecution which the emperors Diocletian and Maximin declared against the Christians, the prefect Dacian ordered the temple to be demolished and razed to the ground, so that the faithful had no means of receiving the Host. Three years later, Constantius, father of the great Constantine, having ascended the throne, the persecution came to an end, the prelates returned to their sees, and the Archbishop Melancius began to rebuild the church, still on the same spot. Shortly afterwards

(about the year 312), Constantine having been converted to the Christian faith, he ordered, among other heroic works to which he was impelled by his Christian zeal, the repairing and building at his expense, in the most sumptuous manner possible, of the basilica of Our Lady of the Assumption of Toledo, which Dacian had caused to be destroyed.

The Archbishop of Toledo at that time was Marinus, a wise and learned man, who was on intimate terms with the Emperor. This gave him a free hand, and he spared nothing to build a remarkably magnificent church of grand and sumptuous architecture. It was this church which lasted through the Catholic dominion, the one visited by the Virgin, the one which was turned into a mosque during the conquest of Spain; the same one which, when Toledo was retaken by King Alonzo VI, again became a church, and the plan of which was taken to Oviedo by order of King Don Alonzo the Chaste, in order that the church of San Salvador in the latter city should be built on the same lines, in the year 803. "Those who are desirous of knowing the shape, grandeur, and majesty of the Cathedral of Toledo in those days, when the Queen of Angels came down to visit it, need only go and see

---

Oviedo Cathedral, and they will be satisfied." For ourselves, we greatly regret that we could not enjoy this pleasure. Finally, under the happy reign of Saint Ferdinand, Don Rodriguez being Archbishop of Toledo, the church assumed the marvellous and magnificent form which it possesses to-day, and which, it is said, is that of the temple of Diana at Ephesus. O artist chronicler, permit me to disbelieve this! The temple of Ephesus was not as beautiful as the cathedral of Toledo. Archbishop Rodriguez, accompanied by the King and the court, having celebrated pontifical mass, laid the foundation stone on a Saturday, in the year 1227. The work was carried on with much vigour until it was completed and carried to the highest degree of perfection which human art can attain.

May we be forgiven for this slight historical digression, a thing which we are not prone to indulge in.

The exterior of the cathedral at Toledo is much less richly decorated than that of the cathedral at Burgos; it does not bloom all over with ornaments; it has no arabesques, no lines of saints massed around the portals; it has solid buttresses, clean, sharp angles, a thick cuirass of dressed stone, a steeple of robust aspect, which lacks the delicacy of Gothic work; and all this of a reddish tint, like toast, or the tanned skin of a Palestine pilgrim. But, on the other hand, the interior is carved and wrought like a stalactite grotto.

The gate by which we entered is of bronze and bears the following inscription: "Antonio Zurreno, worker in gold and silver, made this centre door." The interior gives at once a deep impression of grandeur. The church is divided into five naves. The central one is of vast height, the others seem to bow their heads and kneel in token of adoration and respect. Eighty-eight pillars as huge as towers, each one composed of sixteen slender columns set close to each other, support the huge bulk of the edifice. A transept cuts the great nave between the choir and the high altar, and thus forms the arms of the cross. The whole building, a very unusual thing in Gothic cathedrals, which have generally been built at various periods, is in the most homogeneous and complete style; the original plan has been carried out from end to end save in the arrangement of some chapels which in no wise mar the harmony of the general aspect. Stained-glass windows, in which gleam emerald, sapphire, and ruby set in stone tracery-work as delicate as finger-rings, shed a gentle, mysterious light which induces religious ecstasy. When the sunshine is too brilliant, esparto blinds drawn across the windows maintain that cool semi-obscurity which makes Spanish churches so favourable to recollection and prayer. The high altar, or retable, is large enough for a church in itself. It is a huge mass of small columns, niches, statues, scrolls, and arabesques, of which the minutest description would give but a very faint idea. All this work, which rises to the vaulting and runs around the sanctuary, is painted and gilded with inconceivable richness. The rich, warm tones of the old gilding admirably bring out the streaks and spangles of light, cut by the groining and the projecting ornaments, producing wondrous and most varied effects. The paintings on gold backgrounds which adorn the panels of the altar equal in the richness of their colouring the most brilliant paintings of the Venetian school. This combination of colour and the severe and almost hieratic forms of mediæval art is seldom met with. Some of the paintings might well be the early work of Giorgione.

Facing the high altar is the choir, or sillaria, in accordance with Spanish custom. It contains a triple row of stalls in carved wood, wrought and adorned in handsome fashion with historical, allegorical, and sacred bassi-relievi. Gothic art, as the Renaissance approached, never produced anything freer, more perfect, or better designed. This work, the details of which are amazing, is attributed to the patient chisels of Félipe Vigarni and Berruguete. The archbishop's stall, higher than the others, is arranged like a throne and marks the centre of the choir. Jasper columns of a shining brown tone crown this marvellous joiner-work, and upon the entablature rise alabaster figures, also by Félipe Vigarni, but freer and easier in manner, and most effective and elegant. A huge bronze lectern, laden with gigantic missals; great esparto mats; two colossal organs, placed opposite each other, the one on the right, the other on the left,—complete the description of the choir. Behind the retable is the chapel, where are buried Don Alvar de Luna and his wife in two magnificent alabaster tombs placed side by side. The walls of the chapel are ornamented with the Constable's arms and the shells of the order of Santiago, of which he was grand master. Close by, in the vaulting of that portion of the nave here called trascoro, is noticed a stone with a funeral inscription. It is that of a nobleman of Toledo, whose pride revolted at the thought that people of low birth would tread over his tomb. "I will not have the low-born walk over me," he said on his death-bed; and as he bequeathed great wealth to the Church, his strange caprice was humoured by placing his body in the masonry of the vaulting, where assuredly no one will walk over him.

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

We shall not attempt to describe the various chapels; it would take a whole volume. Let us be satisfied with mentioning the tomb of a cardinal, carved in the Arab taste with minute delicacy. We cannot compare it to anything better than lace on a large scale. We shall come at once to the Mozarabic chapel, one of the most interesting in the cathedral. Before describing it, let us explain its name.

At the time of the Moorish invasion the inhabitants of Toledo were obliged to surrender after a two years' siege. They endeavoured to obtain the most favourable terms, and among the articles agreed upon was this, that six churches should be preserved for the Christians who might wish to remain among the barbarians. These churches were those of Saint Mark, Saint Luke, Saint Sebastian, Saint Torquato, Saint Olalla and Saint Just. Thus the faith was preserved in the city during the four hundred years of

---

Moorish dominion, and for this reason the faithful Toledans were called Mozarabs,—that is, mingling with the Arabs. In the reign of Alfonso VI, when Toledo again fell into the hands of the Christians, the papal legate Richard wished to have the Mozarabic ritual given up for the Gregorian rite, backed in this by the king, and Queen Constantia, who preferred the Roman ritual. But the clergy revolted and protested; the faithful were very indignant, and were within an ace of breaking out into rebellion. So the Mozarabic ritual was maintained and enthusiastically observed for many years by the Mozarabs, their sons, and their grandsons. But at last the meaning of the text was forgotten, and no one could be found who could say or understand the prayers which had been the object of such a lively disagreement. Don Francesco Ximenes, Archbishop of Toledo, desiring to preserve so memorable a use, founded a Mozarabic chapel in the cathedral, caused to be translated and printed in ordinary characters the liturgies, which were in Gothic characters, and appointed priests specially charged to celebrate Mass according to this ritual.

The Mozarabic chapel, which still exists to-day, is adorned with most interesting Gothic frescoes, the subject being the battles between the Toledans and the Moors. They are admirably preserved, the colours are as bright as if they had been laid on yesterday, and an archæologist would find here innumerable interesting details of arms, costumes, equipments, and architecture; for the principal fresco represents a view of ancient Toledo which must have been very accurate. In the lateral frescoes are painted with a wealth of detail the vessels which brought the Arabs to Spain. A professional man might obtain much useful information for the difficult history of the navy in the Middle Ages. The arms of Toledo, five mullets sable on a field argent, are represented in several places in this chapel, which is closed after the Spanish fashion by iron-work gates beautifully wrought.

The Chapel of the Virgin, the walls of which are covered all over with porphyry, jasper, yellow and violet breccia superbly polished, fairly surpasses in richness the splendours of the "Thousand and One Nights." It contains a great many works, among others a reliquary given by Saint Louis which contains a piece of the true Cross.

By way of taking breath we shall, if you please, take a turn through the cloisters, the elegant and severe arcades of which enclose beautiful masses of verdure that, thanks to the shadow of the church, are still fresh in spite of the burning heat of the season. All the walls of the cloister are covered with vast frescoes in the style of Van Loo, by a painter called Bayeu. These paintings, which are of fair composition and pleasant colour, are not in harmony with the style of the building, and no doubt have taken the place of older paintings, weather-worn or thought to be too Gothic by the people of taste of the time. A cloister is well placed near a church; it forms a happy transition from the peace of the sanctuary to the noise of the city; you can walk, dream, and think in it without being compelled to follow the prayers and sermons. The Catholics enter the church, the Christians generally remain in the cloister. This state of mind has been understood by the Catholic Church, which is a clever psychologist. In countries that are religious-minded, the cathedral is the most ornate, the richest, the most highly gilded, the most flowery place; there are to be found the coolest shades and the deepest peace; the music is superior to that of the theatre, and the splendour of the ceremonies is unrivalled. It is the central point, the attractive spot, as is our Opéra in Paris. We Northern Catholics, with our Voltairean temples, have no conception of the luxury, the elegance, the comfort of Spanish churches. They are furnished and living churches, and do not have the icy-cold, deserted look of ours. The faithful here can dwell familiarly with their God.

---

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

---

The sacristies and the chapter halls of the cathedral of Toledo are more than regal in their magnificence. Nothing can be more noble and picturesque than these great halls ornamented with the quiet, rich luxury of which the Church alone possesses the secret. Everywhere carved wood-work, in black oak or walnut, portières in tapestry or damask of the Indies, curtains with broad deep folds, ornamental hangings, Persian carpets, fresco paintings. I shall not attempt to describe them individually, but merely mention one piece of work adorned with beautiful frescoes representing religious subjects, in the German style which the Spaniards have so happily imitated. This work is attributed to Berruguete's nephew, though it may be Berruguete's own. For these great geniuses practised at one and the same time the three forms of art. There is also a vast ceiling painted by Luca Giordano, on which swarm a multitude of angels and allegorical figures in the most startling foreshortening, causing a remarkable optical effect. From the centre of the ceiling falls a beam of light which, although it is painted upon a flat surface, seems to fall perpendicularly upon you from whatever point you look at it.

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

There is the Treasury, which contains the beautiful copes of brocade, of gold cloth, of silk damask, of marvellous lace, the gilded reliquaries, the diamond-studded monstrances, the huge silver candlesticks, the embroidered banners, in a word, all the properties and accessories needed in the performance of that sublime Catholic drama called the Mass.

In the closets in one of these rooms is preserved the Blessed Virgin's wardrobe; for gold, marble, or alabaster statues are unable to satisfy the passionate piety of the Southerners. Carried away by their devotion, they heap upon the object of their worship ornaments extravagant in their richness; nothing is too beautiful, nothing too brilliant. They care little that the shape and material of the statue disappear under the shower of gems; the great point with them is that it shall be physically impossible to hang another pearl in the marble ears of the idol, to set a larger brilliant in her golden crown, or to draw with precious stones one other design upon the brocade of her dress.

Never did any queen of antiquity, not even Cleopatra who drank pearls, never did any Byzantine empress, never did any mediæval duchess or Venetian courtesan of Titian's day possess a more gorgeous jewel-case, a richer wardrobe than Our Lady of Toledo. Some of the dresses were shown us. One of them is wholly covered—so much so that one cannot even imagine what the stuff is of which it is made—with designs and arabesques embroidered in fine pearls, among which are some of inestimable size and price. These are edged with black pearls of incredible rarity. Suns and stars of gems are studded over this marvellous dress which dazzles the eye and is worth several millions of francs.

We closed our visit by climbing the steeple, the top of which is reached by ladders placed one above another, rather straight and not very safe to look at. About half-way up there is seen, in a sort of store-room, a collection of huge lay figures, coloured and dressed in the fashion of the last century, which are used on the occasion of some procession or another, like that of the Tarasque at Tarascon.

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

The magnificent prospect enjoyed from the top of the spire largely repays one for the fatigue of the ascent. The whole city is spread out below. The hump-shaped, quaintly contorted rocks of blue granite which border the Tagus and bound one side of the view of Toledo, increase the strangeness of the landscape, which is flooded with hard, pitiless, blinding light, which no gradation tempers, and which is increased by the reverberation of a cloudless, vapourless, white-hot sky.

The heat was atrocious ; it was like that of a lime-kiln, and one had to be urged by mad curiosity not to give up further visiting of monuments in such an African temperature ; but we were still possessed with the fierce ardour of Parisians enthusiastic over local colour. Nothing could stop us ; we only stayed our steps to drink, for we were thirstier than Afric's golden sands, and we imbibed water as if we had been dried sponges.

Having visited the cathedral, we resolved, in spite of our thirst, to proceed to the church of San Juan de los Reyes, but it was only after prolonged discussion that we succeeded in obtaining the keys of it, for the church has been closed for five or six years, and the convent to which it belongs is abandoned and falling into decay.

The church is situated on the banks of the Tagus, close to the Saint Martin's Bridge. The walls have that rich, orange tint which colours ancient monuments in rainless climates. A series of statues of kings, in noble and chivalrous attitudes and of proud port, decorates the exterior, but this is not the most remarkable point of San Juan de los Reyes, for all mediæval churches have a population of statues. Innumerable chains hanging from hooks adorn the walls from top to bottom. These are the fetters of the Christian prisoners delivered at the conquest of Granada. These chains, suspended by way of ornament and ex voto, give the church a strange and repulsive prison look.

The key turned with difficulty in the rusty lock. Having overcome this slight obstacle, we entered an exceedingly beautiful devastated cloister. Separate slender columns supported upon their flowery capitals arcades adorned with mouldings and tracery of extreme delicacy. Along the walls ran long inscriptions in praise of Ferdinand and Isabella, in Gothic characters interlaced with flowers, lines, and arabesques, — a Christian imitation of the maxims and verses of the Koran which the Moors used as architectural ornaments. What a pity that so precious a monument should be thus abandoned !

---

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

Having kicked open some doors fastened by worm-eaten bars or obstructed by rubbish, we succeeded in entering the church, built in a charming style, and which seems, save for some startling mutilations, to have been completed but yesterday. There is nothing more elegant and delicate in Gothic art. Around the church runs a gallery with open-work balustrade. Its venturesome balconies cling to the groups of pillars, following closely their hollows and projections. Vast scrolls, eagles, chimeras, hieratic beasts, coats of arms, bannerets, and emblematic inscriptions after the fashion of those in the cloister, form the decoration. The choir, placed opposite the high altar at the other end of the church, is separated from it by a bold and striking elliptical arch. The altar, which must have been a masterpiece of sculpture and painting, has been pitilessly torn down. Such useless devastation stuns one and makes one doubt human intelligence, for in what respect do old stones injure new ideas ? Cannot a revolution be managed without overthrowing the past ?

TOLEDO

It seems to us the constitution would have lost nothing if the church of Ferdinand and Isabella the Catholic, that noble Queen who believed the word of a man of genius and presented the universe with a new world, had been left standing.

Venturing upon a half-ruined stair, we reached the interior of the convent. The refectory is large, but presents nothing interesting save a frightful painting above the door. It represents a body in a state of decomposition, with all the horrible details so complacently treated by Spanish painters. It is rendered still more hideous by the layer of dirt and dust which covers it. A symbolical and gloomy inscription, one of those biblical sentences which form such a terrible warning to human nothingness, is placed at the foot of the sepulchral picture, which is a singular choice for a refectory. I know not if the stories told of the gluttony of monks are true, but for myself, I should not have much appetite in a dining-room thus adorned.

Above, on either side of a long passageway, are ranged, like the cells of a beehive, the deserted cells of the vanished monks. They are exactly alike and all whitewashed. The whitewashing considerably diminishes the poetic impression, for it prevents terror and imagination from concealing themselves in dark corners. The interior of the church and the cloister are also whitewashed, both thus having a look of newness which contrasts with the style of the architecture and the condition of the buildings. The lack of moisture and the heat of the climate have prevented plants and weeds from growing in the interstices of the stones and rubbish, which consequently do not possess the green mantle of ivy which time throws over ruins in Northern climates.

We wandered for a long time through the abandoned edifice, traversing long, endless corridors, ascending and descending risky stairs, and then withdrew, for there was nothing interesting to see, not even the kitchens to which our guide showed us the way. The church and cloister are rather magnificent, the remainder is simple to a degree. Everything is done for the soul, and nothing for the body.

At a short distance from San Juan de los Reyes stands the famous Synagogue Mosque, but without a guide you might pass a score of times in front of it without suspecting its existence. Our man knocked at a door cut in a most insignificant-looking wall of reddish clay. After a time — for the Spaniards are never in a hurry — it was opened and we were asked if we wished to see the synagogue. On replying affirmatively, we were shown into a sort of courtyard filled with vegetation, in the centre of which grew an Indian fig-tree with its deep-cut leaves intensely and brilliantly green as if they were varnished. At the end of the court rises an insignificant building looking more like a barn than anything else. We entered it, and never were we so greatly surprised: we were in the far East. The slender columns with their flaring, turban-like capitals, the Turkish arches, the verses of the Koran, the flat ceiling with cedar panels, the light admitted from above, — all was there. Vestiges of former paintings, almost effaced, cast strange colours upon the walls and added to the peculiar effect. This synagogue, which the Arabs turned into a mosque and the Christians into a church, is now used as a workshop and dwelling by a joiner; the altar has been replaced by a bench. This profanation is quite recent. The vestiges of the retable are still visible, and the inscription on black marble which commemorates the consecration of this edifice to the Catholic worship.

The Jews of Toledo, probably in order to diminish the horror which they inspired in the minds of the

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

Christian population on account of their being deicides, claimed not to have consented to the death of Jesus Christ. When Jesus was tried, the council of priests presided over by Caiaphas obtained the opinion of the different tribes, to know whether He should be released or put to death. The Spanish Jews were asked, and the Toledo synagogue declared in favour of acquittal; so that tribe is not imbrued with the blood of the Just One and does not deserve the execration felt for the Jews who voted against the Son of God. The original text of the reply of the Toledo Jews, with the Latin translation of the Hebrew, is preserved in the Vatican archives. In recompense they were allowed to build this synagogue, which is, I believe, the only one ever tolerated in Spain.

We had been told of the ruins of a Moorish pleasure palace, the Galiana Palace. We went to it on leaving the synagogue, although we were tired, for time pressed and the next day we were to leave for Madrid. The palace is situated outside the city in the Vega. After fifteen minutes' walk through fields and cultivated ground cut by innumerable irrigation ditches we reached a shady clump of trees at the foot of which turned the irrigation wheel, of unique and Egyptian simplicity. Earthenware jars fastened to the spokes of the wheel by reed ropes draw up the water and pour it into a canal formed of hollow tiles leading to a reservoir, whence it is easily led by ditches to the parts to be watered.

A huge heap of reddish brick showed its broken outline behind the foliage of the trees. It was the Galiana Palace. We entered this vast mass of débris, which is inhabited by a peasant family, through a low door. It is impossible to imagine anything darker, smokier, more cavern-like, or dirtier. The Troglo-dytes were lodged like princes in comparison with these people; yet the lovely Galiana, the Moorish beauty, with the long, henna-painted eyes, with bro-caded jacket studded with pearls, had stepped with her little slippers upon this broken-down floor; she had leaned out of this window, looking out upon the Vega where the Moorish horsemen were practising throwing the djerrid.

We bravely continued our exploration, climbing to the upper stories by rickety ladders, clinging with feet and hands to the tufts of dried grass which hung like beards from the grimy old walls. Having reached the top, we became aware of a singular phenomenon; we had entered with white trousers, we were going out with black trousers, but of a swarming, leaping black. We were covered by imperceptible little fleas which had rushed at us in compact swarms, attracted by the coolness of our Northern blood. I could never have believed that there were so many fleas in the world as I saw then.

---

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

A few pipes which led water to the vapour baths are the only remains of magnificence spared by time. The glass mosaic, the enamelled ware, the marble columns with cupolas, gilded, carved, and adorned with verses of the Koran, the alabaster fountains, the stones pierced with holes to allow perfumes to filter through, — all has vanished. There is nothing left but the framework of the huge walls and heaps of brick which are turning to dust. For these marvellous buildings, which recall the fairy scenes of the “Thousand and One Nights,” were unfortunately constructed with brick only, or with clay covered with a layer of stucco and lime. All the lacework and arabesque are not, as generally believed, cut out of marble or stone, but moulded in plaster, which allows of their being reproduced in any quantity and very cheaply. It takes the preserving dryness of the Spanish climate to allow monuments built of such frail materials to stand until our day.

First and foremost we had to get rid of the minute population which marked with their bites the folds of our once white trousers. The Tagus was not far away, and we betook ourselves there directly with the princess's fleas. The bank of the Tagus on this side is defended by steep rocks difficult of access, and we had some trouble in getting down to the spot where we proposed to carry out the great drowning operation. I started to swim, as carefully as possible, so as to be worthy of so famous and respectable a river as the Tagus, and a few strokes brought me to ruined constructions and shapeless remains of mason-work, which rose a few feet above the level of the river. On the bank, on the same side, stood an old ruined tower with a semicircular arch, where some clothes hung up by washerwomen were briskly drying in the sun. I had reached Florinda's Bath, and the tower beside me was King Rodriguez' Tower.

But night is falling and we have to return to the inn for supper and bed, for we have to see the hospital of Don Pedro Gonzales de Mendoza, the Arms Manufactory, the remains of the Roman amphitheatre, and many another interesting sight; and we have to leave to-morrow evening. For my own part, I am so tired out by the pointed pavements that I have a great mind to turn upside down and walk a little on my hands, like the clown, to rest my weary feet. Oh, cabs of civilisation! Oh, omnibuses of progress! how pitifully I called upon you! but of what use would you have been in the streets of Toledo?

The Cardinal's Hospital is a vast building of vast and severe proportions. We rapidly traversed the court enclosed by columns and arcades, which has nothing remarkable save two wells with white marble walls. We entered the church and examined the cardinal's tomb, carved in alabaster by that marvellous Berruguete, who lived to be more than eighty years of age, endowing his country with masterpieces of varied style and perfection. The cardinal lies upon his tomb in his pontifical robes. Death has pinched his nose with its skinny fingers, and the final contraction of the muscles seeking to detain the soul about to escape has drawn in the corners of his mouth and thinned his chin. Never was there a death-mask more fearfully truthful, and yet, such is the beauty of the work that the repulsive side of it is forgotten. Little children in attitudes of desolation support the plinth and the cardinal's coat of arms. The softest and most easily worked terracotta is not freer and richer; this work is not carved, it is kneaded.

TOLEDO

The church also contains two paintings by Domenico Theotokopouli, called el Greco, an extravagant and erratic painter scarce known outside of Spain. His curse, as you are aware, was the dread of being considered an imitator of Titian, whose pupil he had been; it led him into the strangest caprices and attempts. One of these paintings, which represents the Holy Family, must have worried poor el Greco, for at the first glance it might be mistaken for a real Titian. The great warmth of the colouring, the brilliant tone of the draperies, the beautiful golden-amber tint, which warms even the coldest colours of the Venetian painter,—all combine to deceive the most practised eye. Only, the touch is less free and rich. The little sense which el Greco had left must have completely vanished in the sombre ocean of madness after he had completed this masterpiece. There are very few painters nowadays capable of going mad in the same way.

The other painting, which represents the Baptism of Christ, is wholly in el Greco's second manner. Black and white are used to excess; it is full of violent contrasts, of startling tints, of foreshortened attitudes, of folds broken and rumpled at will; but throughout runs a depraved energy, a diseased power, which betray a great painter and a madman of genius. Few paintings have interested me as much as those of el Greco, for his worst always offer something unexpected and impossible which surprises you and makes you dream.

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

From the Hospital we went to the Arms Manufactory. It is a large, symmetrical building in good taste, founded by Charles III, whose name is met with on every monument of public utility. It is situated close to the Tagus, the water of which is used to temper the blades and also to drive the machinery. The workshops are situated around a great courtyard surrounded with porticos and arcades, like almost every courtyard in Spain. Here the iron is heated, there hammered, further on tempered; in this room are the grinding and polishing stones, in the other the sheaths and hilts are made. We shall not carry this investigation farther, for it would not be of any particular use to our readers, and we will merely say that into the manufacture of these justly famous blades enter old horse and mule shoes, which are carefully collected for the purpose. To prove to us that Toledo blades still deserve their reputation, we were taken to the testing room. A tall and exceedingly powerful workman took a blade of the most ordinary kind, a straight cavalry rapier, drove it into a pig of lead fixed to the wall and bent the blade in every direction like a riding-whip, so that the hilt almost touched the point. The elastic temper of the steel enabled it to bear this test without breaking. Then the man stood up in front of an anvil, and struck it so clean that the blade cut into it. This feat reminded me of that scene in one of Walter Scott's novels, where Richard Cœur de Lion and King Saladin cut iron bars and down pillows. So the Toledo blades of to-day are as good as those of yore; the secret of the temper has not been lost, but the secret of form. All that these modern works lack is really only that trifle, so despised by progressive people, in order to compare with the old. A modern sword is nothing but an instrument; a sword of the sixteenth century was both a weapon and a gem.

We expected to find in Toledo some old weapons, daggers, poniards, fencing-swords, two-handed swords,

---

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

rapiers, and other curiosities which one could hang up as trophies on some wall or sideboard, and for that purpose we had committed to memory the names and private marks of the sixty armourers of Toledo which Jubinal collected; but we had no opportunity of testing our knowledge, for there are no swords to be found in Toledo, any more than you can find leather in Cordova, lace in Malines, oysters at Ostend, or pâté de foie gras in Strasbourg. Curiosities are to be found in Paris alone, and if any are met with in foreign countries, they have come from there.

We were also shown the remains of the Roman Amphitheatre and the Naumachia, which look exactly like a ploughed field, as Roman ruins generally do. My imagination is not lively enough to lead me into ecstasies over such problematical nothingness. It is something I leave to antiquarians, and I would rather tell you of the walls of Toledo, which are visible to the naked eye and marvellously picturesque. The masonry unites very happily with the roughness of the ground; it is often very difficult to say where the rock ends and the rampart begins. Each successive civilisation has worked at them. Here a piece of wall is Roman, a door is Gothic, and the battlements are Moorish. The whole of the portion of the ramparts which stretches from the Cambron Gate to the Visagra Gate (via sacra), where the Roman road probably ended, was built by a Gothic king, Wamba. Every stone has its history.

Toledo stands out nobly upon the horizon, seated on its rocky throne with its girdle of towers and its crown of churches. It is impossible to imagine a firmer or sterner profile, richer in colour and more positively preserving the mediæval aspect. I gazed upon it for more than an hour, seeking to satisfy my eyes and to impress deep in my memory the outlines of this admirable view. Night, alas! came on too soon, and we went to bed, for we were to start at one in the morning in order to escape the great heat of the day.

GRANADA

WE had to go through Madrid again to take the Granada stage-coach. We might have caught it at Aranjuez, but in that case we ran the risk of finding every seat taken.

But Madrid was unbearable, and the two days we had to spend in it seemed to us two centuries long, at least. We dreamed of nothing but orange trees, lemon trees, cachuchas, castanets, bodices, and picturesque costumes, for everybody had given us marvellous accounts of Andalusia, with that somewhat boastful emphasis which Spaniards will never get rid of, any more than the French Gascons.

The longed for moment came at last, for everything comes, even the day you desire to see, and we started in a very comfortable coach drawn by a troop of vigorous mules, with coats clipped and shining, which went at a great speed. The coach was lined with nankeen and provided with green blinds and curtains. It appeared to us supremely elegant after the vile galleys, sillas, volantes, and coaches in which we had been jolted up to this time, and really it would have been a very commodious vehicle but for the lime-kiln temperature, which burned us up in spite of our constantly moving fans and the extreme thinness of our clothing.

The environs of Madrid are desolate, bare, and burned up, although less stony on this side than when coming from Guadarrama; the country, which is uneven rather than hilly, rises and falls monotonously without any other feature than powdery, chalky villages scattered here and there over the general aridity, and which would never be noticed did not the square church-tower attract attention. Spires are scarce in Spain, and the ordinary form of steeples is a four-square tower. At every cross-road gloomy crosses spread out their sinister arms; from time to time ox-carts come along, the driver asleep under his mantle, fierce-looking mounted peasants with muskets at the saddlebow. At midday the heavens are the colour of molten lead; the soil of a powdery gray with sparkles of light, scarcely assumes an azure tint in the farthest distance; there is not a clump of trees, not a shrub, not a drop of water in the bed of the dried-up torrent, nothing to rest the eye and the mind. The only shelter which can be got from the burning rays of the sun is that of the narrow line of bluish shade projected by the mules. It is true that we were well into mid-July, which is not just the time to enjoy a cool trip through Spain, but we believe that countries should be visited in their most characteristic season, Spain in summer and Russia in winter.

There is nothing worth mentioning until the royal residence at Aranjuez is reached. It is a château built of brick with stone facings, producing a red and white effect, with great slate roofs, pavilions, and vanes, which recall buildings of the days of Henry IV and Louis XIII, or the palace of Fontainebleau and the houses of the Place Royale in Paris. The Tagus, which is crossed by a hanging bridge, maintains the vegetation in a condition of verdure which is greatly admired by the Spaniards, and allows Northern trees to grow vigorously. At Aranjuez are elms, ashes, birches, and aspens, as strange there as here would be Indian figs, or aloes and palms.

We were shown a gallery constructed expressly to enable Godoy, the famous Prince of Peace, to pass from his mansion to the palace. On leaving, the bull-fight arena is seen on the left. It is of rather a monumental form. While we were changing mules, we hurried to the market-place to buy oranges and eat ices, or rather, snow flavoured with citron, in one of those open-air refreshment-stalls, as common in Spain as wineshops are in France. Instead of drinking glasses of bad wine or nips of brandy, the peasant and herb-seller of the market-place indulge in a bebida helada which does not steal away their brains and turn them into brutes. The absence of drunkenness among the country people here makes them much superior to the corresponding class in our so-called civilised countries.

The name Aranjuez, which is derived from ara Jovis, indicates clearly enough that the palace was built upon the site of a former temple to Jupiter. We had not time to visit the interior, and we regretted it but little, for all palaces are alike. So are all courtiers. Originality is to be found only among the people, and the rabble alone seems to have preserved the privilege of poetry.

From Aranjuez to Ocaña, the landscape, without being remarkable, is nevertheless more picturesque. Hills of fine appearance, well lighted, diversify the sides of the road, when the whirlwind of dust in which the coach is galloping, enclosed like a god within its cloud, clears up, blown by some favourable wind, and enables you to see the details. The road, although badly kept, is good enough, thanks to the marvellous climate, in which rain is scarcely known, and the small number of carriages, most of the transportation being done by beasts of burden.

We were to have supper and to sleep at Ocaña while waiting for the royal mail in order to have the advantage of its escort, for we were soon to enter La Mancha, at that time infested by bands of brigands. We stopped at an inn, outwardly good-looking, with a galleried courtyard covered with a superb awning, the cloth of which, either double or single, formed symmetrical patterns through its greater or less transparency. Myrtles, pomegranates and jessamine, planted in pots of red clay, brightened and perfumed this inner court, which was lighted with a dim, soft, mysterious light. The patio is a charming invention. You have more coolness and space than in your room; you can walk or read in it; you can be alone or in company; it is a neutral ground where people meet, and where, without having to submit to the boredom of formal visits and introductions, you get to know each other and become somewhat intimate; and when, as in Granada or Sevilla, there is the additional pleasure of an artificial fountain, I know nothing more delightful, especially in a country where the thermometer indicates tropical heat.

While waiting for the mail, we indulged in a siesta. That is a habit which one must necessarily acquire in Spain, for the heat from two to five in the afternoon is beyond the conception of a Parisian. The paving-stones are red-hot, like the knockers of the doors, fire seems to rain down from heaven, the grain bursts in the ear, the earth cracks like the enamel of an overheated stove, the crickets sing with greater vivacity than ever, and the little air which is wafted around seems to issue from the brazen mouth of a furnace. The shops are closed, and for all the money in the world you could not induce a tradesman to sell you anything. Dogs and Frenchmen, as the vulgar saying expresses it, are alone to be met with in the streets. The guides, even if you were to present them with Havana cigars or a ticket to the bull-fight, — two things which are particularly attractive to a Spanish guide, — would refuse to take you to the meanest of monuments. The only thing you can do is to sleep like other people, and you very soon make up your mind to it; for what are you going to do if you are the only waking person in the midst of a sleeping nation?

Our rooms, which were whitewashed, were perfectly clean, the insects which had been described to us as swarming everywhere, had not yet put in an appearance, and our sleep was untroubled by any many-footed nightmare. At five in the afternoon we rose to take a turn before supper. Ocaña is not very rich in monuments, and its chief title to fame is a desperate attack by Spanish troops on a French redoubt. The redoubt was taken, but most of the battalion perished upon the field. The heroes were buried each where he had fallen. Their ranks had been so well kept, in spite of the storm of shot, that they may be traced by the regularity of the graves. Diamante wrote a play entitled "The Hercules of Ocaña," no doubt composed for some athlete of prodigious strength. It came to our mind as we passed through Ocaña.

The harvest was ending at the time when grain with us is just beginning to turn yellow, and the sheaves were being carried to great threshing-floors of beaten earth ; a sort of circus, on which horses and mules separate the grain from the chaff by the stamping of their hoofs. The animals are harnessed to a sort of sledge, on which stands, in a bold, fine attitude, the man charged with directing the operation. It takes a great deal of coolness and firmness to keep upright on this frail machine, which is borne along by three or four horses at top speed. A painter of Leopold Robert's school could make good use of these scenes, so Biblical and primitive in their simplicity. In this place the tanned heads, the sparkling eyes, the madonna-like faces, the characteristic costumes, the blue of the sky, and the splendour of the sun would be as ready to his hand as in Italy. The heavens that night were of a rosy, milky blue ; the fields as far as the eye could reach stretched out in one vast surface of pale gold, on which stood out, like islands in an ocean of light, ox-carts disappearing under the sheaves. The chimera of a shadeless picture so eagerly sought for by the Chinese was realised ; everything was light and brightness, the deepest shadow was no more than pearly gray.

We were at last served with a decent supper, — at least, it seemed such to our appetite, — in a low room adorned with small paintings on glass of rather awkward Venetian rococo. We had to wait until half-past two in the afternoon for the arrival of the stage-coach, for it would not have been prudent to start without it. We had besides a special escort of four cavalymen armed with carbines, pistols and long swords. They were tall fellows with dark faces framed in by huge black whiskers, pointed hats, broad gray belts, velvet breeches, and leather gaiters, who looked more like robbers than constabulary. It was an excellent idea to take them with us, as thus we should not have to meet them.

Twenty soldiers packed into a galley followed the stage-coach. The galley is a springless cart with two or four wheels. An esparto net takes the place of flooring. This concise description will give you an idea of the position of these poor wretches, obliged to stand and hang on to the side of the racks to avoid falling over each other. At a speed of twelve miles an hour, with terrific heat and a vertical sun, you will confess it takes a stock of heroic joviality to consider such a situation comical; and yet these poor soldiers, in ragged uniforms, foodless, with nothing to drink but the tepid water in their gourds, and jolted about like rats in a trap, laughed and sang all the way. The sobriety and endurance of the Spaniards are marvellous; they are like the Arabs in this respect, it is impossible to carry farther forgetfulness of physical discomfort, — but though they had neither shoes nor bread, they had a guitar.

All this portion of the kingdom of Toledo which we were traversing is dreadfully barren, influenced by its nearness to La Mancha, Don Quixote's country, which is the most desolate, forlorn province in Spain. We soon passed Guardia, an insignificant little place of most wretched aspect.

Puerto Lapiche is composed of a few semi-ruinous hovels perched low upon the slope of a cracked, worn hillside, the ground of which has become friable by dint of being sunburned, and falls away in curiously shaped gaps. It is the very acme of aridity and desolation; everything is the colour of cork or pumice-stone; the fire of heaven seems to have passed over the spot. A gray powder as fine as ground sandstone is dusted over the whole picture. The wretchedness is the more heart-breaking that the brilliancy of an implacable sky brings out all its poverty; the cloudy melancholy of the North pales by the side of the brilliant wretchedness of warmer countries.

The sight of such miserable hovels fills one with pity for the robbers who are obliged to live by their wits in a country where you cannot raise an egg in a circuit of thirty miles. The stage-coaches and the galley-trains are really an insufficient resource for them, and the brigands who cruise about La Mancha must often be satisfied to sup on a handful of the sweet acorns which Sancho Panza delighted in; for how can you rob people who have no money and no pockets, the furniture of whose houses consists of four walls, and whose sole utensils are a stewpan and a chair? To sack such villages strikes me as one of the gloomiest fancies which can occur to robbers out of work.

A little beyond Puerto Lapiche we entered La Mancha, and saw on the right two or three windmills which claim to have successfully withstood the charge of Don Quixote. At the time we saw them, they were slowly turning their flabby sails under the impulse of a broken-winded breeze. The venta, where we stopped to drain two or three jars of fresh water, also boasts of having lodged the immortal hero of Cervantes' novel.

GRANADA

We were starving when we reached Manzanares at midnight. We had supper about two in the morning, to provide which half the village had to be awakened.

We got back into the coach, we went to sleep, and when we opened our eyes we were near Valdepeñas, a place famous for its wine. The ground and the hills, studded with stones, were of a peculiar red tone, and we could just perceive, on the horizon, the dentelated crests of the hills, which stood out very sharply in spite of the great distance.

Valdepeñas is very commonplace. Its whole reputation is due to its vineyards. Its name, which means stony valley, is quite accurate.

At Santa Cruz we were asked to purchase all sorts of pocket knives — navajas. Santa Cruz and Albacete are famous for fancy cutlery. The navajas, made in the most characteristic Arabic and barbaric taste, have open-worked handles through which show red, green, or blue spangles. Coarse inlaid work, but designed with dash, adorns the blade, which is fish-shaped and always very sharp. Most of them have mottoes, such as “Soy de uno solo” (I am one man’s), or “Cuando esta vivora pica, no hay remedio en la botica”

(When this adder stings, there is no antidote in the pharmacy). Sometimes the blade is rayed with three parallel lines inlaid in red, which gives it a most formidable appearance. The size of the navaja varies from three inches to three feet in length. Some majos (peasants of the better class) carry some which, when opened, are as long as a sabre. A spring or a ring to which a turn is given secures the blade in a straight line. The navaja is the favourite weapon of the Spaniards, especially of the country people. They use it with incredible dexterity, wrapping their cloak around their arm by way of buckler. The science of the navaja has its professors like fencing, and navaja-teachers are as numerous in Andalusia as fencing-masters in Paris. Each navaja expert has his secret lunges and his own particular strokes. It is said that adepts can tell by looking at a wound to what artist it is due, just as we can tell a painter by the touch of his brush.

The undulations of the ground now became more marked and more frequent; we were constantly ascending and descending. We were approaching the Sierra Morena, which bounds the kingdom of Andalusia; beyond that line of violet-coloured mountains was the paradise of our dreams. The stones were already growing into rocks, the hills into terraced groups. Thistles six and seven feet high rose by the roadside like the halberds of invisible soldiers. Although I claim not to be an ass, I am very fond of thistles, a taste which, for the matter of that, I share with butterflies. These surprised me. They were superb plants full of delightful suggestions for ornament. There is no arabesque or scroll work in Gothic architecture which is more cleanly cut or more finely chiselled. From time to time we could see in the neighbouring fields great yellow spots as if sacks of cut straw had been emptied there, but when we drew near the straw rose with a whirl and flew away noisily. They were flights of grasshoppers resting; there must have been millions of them. It made the country smack strangely of Egypt.

Not far from the venta, on the right of the road, were some pillars on which were exposed the heads of criminals, a sight which is always reassuring and proves that one is in a civilised country. The road ascended, zigzagging constantly; we were about to traverse the Puerto de los perros (Dogs' Gate). It is a narrow gorge, a break made in the mountain wall by the torrent, which leaves just room enough for the road which runs by its side. The Dogs' Gate is so called because it is the way through which the defeated Moors left Andalusia, bearing with them the happiness and civilisation of Spain. Spain, which is as close to Africa as Greece to Asia, was never intended for European manners; the genius of the East shows there in every form, and it is perhaps a pity that it did not remain Moorish and Mohammedan.

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

It is impossible to imagine anything more picturesque and grand than this gate of Andalusia. The gorge is cut in huge rocks of red marble, the gigantic layers of which rise one above another with almost architectural regularity. The enormous blocks, with broad transversal fissures, the marble veins of the mountain, a sort of terrestrial anatomical preparation which enables one to study the structure of the globe, are of a size which makes the mightiest Egyptian granite constructions appear microscopical; in the crevices grow green oaks and huge cork trees, which seem no bigger than tufts of grass on an ordinary wall. As the centre of the gorge is reached, the vegetation becomes denser and forms an impenetrable jungle, through which one occasionally catches a glimpse of the sparkling waters of the torrent. The slope is so steep on the right side that it has been thought prudent to provide it with a parapet, else a carriage, going always at full speed and difficult to steer on account of the frequent turns, might very well perform a perilous leap of from five to six hundred feet at the least.

It was in the Sierra Morena that the Knight of the Sad Countenance, after the manner of Amadis on Poverty Rock, performed the famous penitence which consisted in turning somersaults, in his shirt, upon the sharpest rocks, and that Sancho Panza, the practical man, who represents common-sense by the side of lofty madness, found Cardeño's portmanteau so well lined with ducats and fine shirts. The remembrance of Don Quixote comes up at every step in Spain, so thoroughly national is Cervantes' work and so completely do his two heroes incarnate the Spanish character: chivalrous enthusiasm and an adventurous spirit united to much practical common-sense and to a sort of jolly, caustic, and clever good-nature.

Once we had crossed the Sierra Morena, the character of the landscape changed completely. It was as if one had suddenly passed from Europe into Africa.

---

---

The adders, seeking their holes, left their zigzag tracks upon the fine sand of the road; the aloes began to send up their great thorny swords by the edge of the ditches; their broad, fleshy, thick, ashy-gray leaves at once impart a different physiognomy to the landscape. You feel that you are really elsewhere, that you have left Paris for good. It is not so much the difference in climate, in architecture, and costumes, which makes you aware that you are in a foreign country, as the presence of these great plants of torrid climates which we are accustomed to see in hot-houses only. The laurels, the green oaks, the cork trees, the metallic, varnished-leaved fig-trees have a freedom, a robustness, a wildness, which mark a climate in which nature is stronger than man and can do without him.

At our feet was stretched like a vast panorama the beautiful kingdom of Andalusia. The grandeur of the view recalled the sea. Chains of mountains levelled by distance rolled with undulations of infinite gentleness like long azure billows; broad masses of white mist lay between; here and there brilliant sunbeams tipped with gold a nearer hill, and clothed it with a thousand changing colours; other slopes, curiously furrowed, resembled the stuffs one sees in old pictures, yellow on one side and blue on the other: and over all a flood of scintillating, splendid light, such as must have filled the terrestrial paradise; light poured over that ocean of mountains like liquid gold and silver; every obstacle it met breaking it up into a phosphorescent, spangled foam. It was grander than the broadest horizons of the Englishman Martin, and a thousand times more beautiful. The infinite in light is far more sublime and wonderful than the infinite in obscurity.

Aloes, more and more African in height, still showed on our right, and on the left a long wreath of flowers of a most brilliant rose sparkling in emerald foliage marked the meanderings of the bed of the dried-up brook. Profiting by a halt at a relay, my comrade hastened to these flowers and brought back a huge bunch of them. They were rose laurels, of incomparable freshness and beauty. After the rose laurels, came, like a melancholy reflection after a bright burst of laughter, gray woods of olive trees, the pale foliage of which recalls the whitish green of northern willows and matches admirably the ashy tint of the ground. This foliage, of sombre, austere and sweet tone, was very wisely chosen by the ancients, who so skilfully appreciated natural harmonies, as the symbol of peace and wisdom.

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

It was about four o'clock when we reached Baylen, famous for the disastrous capitulation which bears its name. We were to spend the night there, and while waiting for supper, we walked about the town and its neighbourhood.

I was struck by the strange colour of the church at Baylen, which does not go back much beyond the sixteenth century. Stone and marble, baked by the Spanish sun, instead of blackening, as they do in our damp climate, take on reddish tones of delightful warmth and vigour, turning often saffron and purple, like vine leaves towards the close of autumn. By the side of the church, above a low wall gilded with the warmest tints, a palm tree—the first one which I had ever seen growing in the open ground—proudly spread its leaves against the dark azure of the sky. This unexpected palm tree, a sudden revelation of the East, at the corner of the road had a singular effect upon me; I expected to see, out-lined against the sunset sky, the long necks of camels and the floating white burnouses of an Arab caravan.

The somewhat picturesque ruins of some old fortifications included a tower, in sufficient repair to allow of its being ascended with the help of feet and hands and the projections of the stones. We were recompensed for our trouble by the most magnificent prospect. The town of Baylen, with its tiled roofs, its red churches, and its white houses clustering at the foot of the tower like a flock of goats, formed an admirable foreground; beyond, waves of shadow passed over the golden cornfields, and in the far distance, beyond many a mountain range, shone like a silver streak the distant crest of the Sierra Nevada. The lines of snow, catching the light, sparkled with prismatic flashes, and the sun, like a vast golden wheel of which the disc was the hub, sent out like spokes its flaming rays through a sky filled with all shades from agate to aventurine.

The inn where we were to sleep consisted of a large building containing one room with a chimney-place at each end, a ceiling of beams blackened and varnished by smoke, mangers on either side for the horses, mules, and asses, and for travellers a few small side-rooms, containing a bed formed of three planks laid upon two trestles and covered with one of those pellicles of linen between which are scattered a few lumps of wool, which innkeepers, with their characteristic, cool effrontery, claim are mattresses. Nevertheless, we snored like Epimenides and the Seven Sleepers rolled into one.

We started very early to avoid the heat, and again beheld the lovely rose laurel, bright as glory and fresh as love, which had delighted us the night before. Soon our road was barred by the muddy, yellow waters of the Guadalquivir. We were ferried across and started on the road to Jaen. On the left we were shown, in a blaze of light, the Torrequebradilla tower, and before long we perceived the quaint outline of Jaen, the capital of the kingdom of that name.

A huge ochre-coloured mountain, tawny as a lion's skin, powdered with light, gilded by the sun, rises abruptly in the centre of the town. The quaint and picturesque lines of massive towers and the long zig-zags of fortifications mark its bare sides. The cathedral, a vast mass which from a distance seems larger than the city itself, rises proudly, an artificial mountain by the side of the natural one. The cathedral, which is in the Renaissance style and boasts of possessing the very handkerchief on which Veronica received the imprint of our Lord's face, was built by the dukes of Medina Cœli. No doubt it is beautiful, but we had thought of it as older and more remarkable.

GRANADA

It was at Jaen that I saw the greatest number of national and picturesque costumes. The men generally wear blue velvet breeches ornamented with silver filigree buttons; ronda gaiters adorned with inlets, aiguillettes, and arabesques of darker leather, — the most stylish way of wearing them is to button the top and bottom buttons only, so as to show the leg, — broad yellow or red silk sashes, an embroidered brown cloth jacket, a blue or brown cloak, and a broad-brimmed, pointed hat with velvet and silk tufts complete a costume which resembles the traditional dress of Italian brigands. Others wear what is called a sporting costume made of tanned buckskin and green velvet. A few of the women of the lower classes wear red cloaks which show brightly against the darker background of the crowd. The strange dress, the sun-burnt complexions, the flashing eyes, the strong faces, the impassible and calm attitudes of these majos, more numerous than anywhere else, impart to the population of Jaen an aspect more African than European; and the illusion is greatly increased by the heat of the climate,

the dazzling whiteness of the houses (which are white-washed according to Arab fashion), the tawny colour of the ground, and the unchanging blue of the heavens. The Spaniards have a saying about Jaen, "The town is ugly, and the people are wicked;" with which no painter will agree. Here, as with us, most people consider a town is fine when it has streets laid out at right angles, and provided with a sufficient number of lamps and townspeople.

On leaving Jaen we entered a valley which continues as far as the Vega of Granada. At the outset it is arid: barren mountains, crumbling away with dryness, burn you with their white glare like reflecting mirrors; there is no trace of vegetation save a few colourless tufts of fennel. Soon, however, the valley deepens and narrows; springs begin to show; vegetation appears; coolness and shadow are again met with. The Jaen River flows swiftly at the bottom of the valley between the stones and rocks which obstruct it, and bar its way every moment. The road follows it closely in its windings, for in mountainous countries the torrents are still the most successful engineers in tracing a line of road, and the best thing to do is to trust to their guidance.

At one place the valley narrows gradually, and the cliffs close in so as to leave room for the river only. Formerly carriages were obliged to descend into and travel along the bed of the torrent itself, a rather dangerous method on account of the holes and stones, and the depth of the water, which in winter rises a great deal. To remedy this difficulty one of the rocks has been blasted, and a fairly long tunnel cut through it as on a railway. This somewhat important work is only a few years old. Beyond, the valley broadens out again, and the road is no longer obstructed.

There is a break of some miles in my remembrances. Overcome by the heat, which the weather, that was becoming stormy, made absolutely suffocating, I fell asleep. When I awoke again night, which comes so swiftly in Southern climates, had entirely fallen. A furious wind raised whirlwinds of burning dust. That wind must have been a near relative of the African sirocco, and I do not understand why we were not stifled. The shapes of things disappeared in its dusty haze; the sky, usually so splendid on summer nights, looked like the vault of an oven; it was impossible to see two steps ahead. We entered Granada at about two in the morning, and alighted at the Fonda del

Comercio, a so-called French hotel in which there were no sheets, and where we slept in our clothes on the table; but these small troubles did not affect us much. We were in Granada, and in a few hours we should see the Alhambra and the Generalife.

The first thing we did was to have our guide take us to a casa de pupilos, that is, a private house which receives boarders; for as we proposed to stay some time in Granada, the inferior fare of the Fonda del Comercio did not suit us.

From the top of our house, which was surmounted by a sort of look-out, we could see, through clumps of trees upon the crest of a hill, standing out sharply against the blue sky, the massive towers of the fortress of the Alhambra, which the sun coloured with tints of the warmest and most intense red. The picture was filled out by two tall cypresses close to each other, whose black tops rose into the azure above the red walls. You never lose sight of these cypresses; whether you climb the snow-striped slopes of Mulhacen, or whether you wander through the Vega or in the Sierra Elvira, you always see them on the horizon, sombre and motionless in the blue or golden vapour which distance casts over the roofs of the city.

GRANADA

Granada is built upon three hills at one end of the Vega. The Vermilion Towers, so called because of their colour (Torres Bermejas), and which it is claimed are of Roman or even Phœnician origin, stand on the nearest and lowest of these hills; the Alhambra, which is a city in itself, covers the second and highest hill with its square towers connected by high walls, and vast sub-structures which contain within their limits gardens, groves, houses, and squares. The Albaicin is situated upon the third height, separated from the others by a deep ravine full of vegetation, — cacti, colocynths, pistachios, pomegranates, and rose laurels, and a wealth of flowers, while at the bottom rolls the Darro with a current as swift as an Alpine torrent. The Darro, which is a gold-bearing stream, traverses the town now under the open sky, now under bridges so wide that they should rather be called vaults, and joins, in the Vega, at a short distance from the Alameda, the Genil, which is satisfied with being a silver-bearing stream. The course of the river through the city is called Carrera del Darro, and from the balconies of the houses which line it one enjoys a magnificent prospect. The Darro is constantly eating away its banks, and causes frequent landslides.

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

---

The gardens called Carmenes del Darro, of which charming descriptions are met with in Spanish and Moorish poetry, lie on the banks of the Carrera as you go up-stream towards the Avellanos Fountain.

The city is thus divided into four main quarters: Antequeruela, which lies on the slopes of the hill, or rather of the mountain crowned by the Alhambra; the Alhambra and its annex, the Generalife; the Albaicin, formerly a vast fortress, now a ruined, uninhabited quarter; and Granada proper, which stretches in the plain around the Cathedral and the Bibarrambla Place, and which forms a separate quarter.

Such, roughly, is the topographical aspect of Granada, traversed in its greatest breadth by the Darro, surrounded on one side by the Genil which bathes the Alameda or promenade, sheltered by the Sierra Nevada, which one catches sight of at every street-end, and which is brought so close, owing to the clearness of the atmosphere, that it seems as if one could touch it with the hand from the top of balconies and look-outs.

The general appearance of Granada falls short of the idea which one has usually formed of it. In spite of having already suffered many a disappointment, you cannot bring yourself to remember that three or four hundred years and innumerable commonplace people have passed over the scene of so many romantic and chivalrous actions ; you think of a semi-Moorish, semi-Gothic city, in which traceried spires mingle with minarets, and cupolas alternate with terraced roofs ; you expect to see carved, ornamented houses, with coats of arms and heroic mottoes ; quaint buildings, with stories projecting one above the other, with protruding beams and windows adorned with Persian carpets and blue and white pots,—in a word, an opera scene realised and representing some marvellous prospect of the Middle Ages.

The people you meet, dressed in modern costumes, wearing stovepipe hats and frock coats, unconsciously produce an unpleasant effect and appear more hideous than they are ; for they really cannot go about for the greater glory of local colour in albornoz of the days of Boabdil, or in iron armour of the times of Ferdinand and Isabella the Catholic. They insist, like nearly all the townspeople in Spain, that they are not in the least degree picturesque, and they seek to prove that they are civilised by wearing trousers with straps ; that is their main idea. They are afraid of being taken for barbarians and of being considered behind the times, and when the wild beauty of their country is extolled, they humbly apologise for not yet having railroads and steam-driven factories.

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

Granada, although fallen from its ancient splendour, is bright, gay, animated. The inhabitants have a way of reappearing and simulating in marvellous fashion a numerous population. The carriages are handsomer and more numerous than in Madrid. Andalusian vivacity gives to the streets a life and animation unknown to the serious Castilian walkers, who are as noiseless as their own shadows. This is especially true of the Carrera del Darro, the Zacatin, the Plaza Nueva, the Calle de Gomeres, which leads to the Alhambra, the Theatre Square, the bridges, the Alameda, and the main streets. The rest of the city is traversed in every direction by labyrinthine lanes three or four feet wide, which are impassable to carriages, and accurately recall the Moorish streets of Algiers. The only sound heard there is the hoof of an ass or a mule striking sparks from the shining paving-stones, or the monotonous hum of a guitar strummed in some courtyard. The balconies adorned with blinds, pots of flowers and shrubs, or vines, the fine tendrils of which climb from one window to another, the rose laurels which spread their dazzling blooms above the garden walls, the strange play of light and shade which recall Decamps' pictures of Turkish villages, the women seated on the thresholds, the half-naked children tumbling around, the asses which come and go covered with plumes and tufts of wool, — impart to these lanes, which are almost always steep and sometimes provided with steps, a peculiar aspect which does not lack charm, and the unexpectedness of which more than compensates for their lack of regularity.

Victor Hugo, in his charming “Orientales,” says of Granada that —

“It paints its houses with the richest colours.”

The remark is absolutely correct. The houses of even well-to-do people are painted in the quaintest fashion with imitation architectural features, grisaille ornaments, and imitation bassi-relievi. It is a wealth of panels, of scrolls, of bays, of flower pots, of volumes, of medallions full of Burgundy roses, of ovals, of acanthi; of plump Cupids bearing all sorts of allegorical utensils, upon apple-green, fawn, or pale-rose backgrounds; in a word, the highest expression of the rococo style. It is difficult at first to believe that these painted façades are genuine dwellings; you cannot help feeling that you are walking between stage settings. We had already seen at Toledo façades painted in this fashion, but they are far below those of Granada as regards the fancifulness of the ornamentation and the strangeness of the colouring. For my own part, I do not object to this fashion, which is pleasant to the eye and contrasts agreeably with the chalky tone of the whitewashed walls.

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

We spoke just now of the townspeople who dress in the French fashion, but the country people do not follow Paris modes. They have preserved the pointed hat with velvet brim adorned with silk tufts, or the lower crown shaped somewhat like a turban; the jacket ornamented with embroidery and patches of cloth of all colours on the elbows, facings, and collar, which has a vaguely Turkish look; the red or yellow girdle; the trousers with facings fastened with filigree buttons or pillar-pieces soldered to a hook; the leather gaiters open on the side and showing the leg; and the whole costume is more brilliant, more ornamented, more embroidered, more showy, more laden with spangles and tinsel than in the other provinces. There are also a good many costumes called vestido de cazador or sporting-suits, of Cordova leather and blue or green velvet with aiguillettes. It is very fashionable to carry a cane or white stick forked at the end, four feet long, on which you lean carelessly when you stop to talk. No self-respecting majo would dare to appear in public without his stick. Two bandanas, the ends of which hang from the pockets of the jacket, and a long navaja stuck in the belt, not in front, but in the middle of the back, mark the very ideal of elegance in the popular man of fashion.

I was so taken with the costume that the very first thing I did was to order one. I was introduced to Don Juan Zapata, a man who enjoys a great reputation as a maker of national costumes, and who entertained for dress coats and frock coats a hatred at least equal to my own.

But Señor Zapata felt towards his clothes as Cardillac felt towards his gems; it grieved him a great deal to hand them over to his clients. When he came to try on my costume, he was so dazzled by the brilliancy of the flower-pot which he had embroidered upon the brown cloth in the centre of my back that he gave himself up to mad delight and indulged in the wildest extravagance. Then suddenly the thought of having to leave this masterpiece in my hands cooled his hilarity and at once turned him gloomy. On pretext of some alterations to be made, he wrapped the jacket up in his bandana, handed it to his apprentice, — for a Spanish tailor would consider himself dishonoured if he carried a bundle himself, — and went off as if the devil were after him, casting on me a fierce and ironical glance. The next day he came back alone, and drawing from a leather purse the money I had paid him, he told me that it pained him too much to part with the jacket, and he preferred to give me back my money. It was only when I insisted upon the fact that this costume would give a high opinion of his talents and gain him a great reputation in Paris that he consented to let it go.

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

The women have had the good sense not to give up the mantilla, which is the most delightful headgear that can possibly frame in a Spanish face. They go through the streets to the promenade without bonnets, with a red carnation on each temple, with their black lace arranged around their face, and they glide along the walls, using their fans with incomparable grace and skill. A bonnet is a rare thing in Granada. It is true that the more elegant ladies have in some hidden band-box a yellow or crimson concern which they keep in reserve for great occasions ; but thank Heaven ! such occasions are very rare, and the hideous bonnets show in the light of day only on the Queen's feast day or at the ceremonies in the high school. May our fashions never invade the City of the Caliphs, and the terrible threat contained in these two words painted in black at the entrance of a square, "Modista francesca," never be carried out ! It is mistaking the meaning of creation to insist upon imposing the same livery on men in all climates ; it is one of the innumerable mistakes committed by European civilisation.

The Alameda at Granada is unquestionably one of the pleasantest places in the world. It is called Paseo del Salon (the Drawing-room), — a curious name for a walk. Imagine a long avenue of several rows of trees, of a green unique in Spain, closed at each end by a monumental fountain, the basins of which are upheld on the shoulders of aquatic deities curiously formed and delightfully barbaric. These fountains, unlike most such erections, pour out water in broad streams which vanish in fine spray and moist vapour, casting around a delightful coolness. In the side avenues run, enclosed in coloured-pebble beds, brooklets of crystal transparency. A great flower-garden adorned with jets of water, full of shrubs and flowers, myrtles, rose trees jessamine, all the wealth of the Granada flora, fills up the space between the Salon and the Genil, and extends as far as the bridge constructed by General Sebastiani at the time of the French invasion. The Genil comes from the Sierra Nevada in its marble bed through laurel woods of incomparable beauty. Glass and crystal are too opaque, too thick by comparison to give an idea of the limpidity of the water, which but the night before stretched in silver sheets upon the white slopes of the Sierra Nevada. It is a torrent of molten diamonds.

In the evening between seven and eight, meet at the Salon the fashionable people of Granada. The carriages, usually empty, drive along the road, for Spaniards are very fond of walking, and in spite of their pride deign to take themselves out for a stroll. Nothing is more agreeable than to see coming and going in small groups young women and young girls wearing mantillas, bare-armed, with natural flowers in their hair, satin shoes on their feet, fans in their hands, followed at a short distance by their friends and lovers; for in Spain it is not customary to take a lady's arm. The habit of walking alone gives the women a freedom, an elegance, and an ease of manner which our ladies, always hanging to some man's arm, lack. This constant separation of men and women, at least in public, smacks already of the East.

GRANADA

A sight which Northern people cannot have any idea of is the Alameda in Granada at sunset. The Sierra Nevada, the crests of which surround the city on that side, is bathed in the loveliest tints. All the scarps, all the summits, struck by the light, turn rose, but a dazzling rose, ideal, fabulous, silvered over, rippled with iris and opaline reflections which would make the purest colours on a painter's palette look muddy: pearly gray tones, ruby gleams, veins of agate and aventurine which would challenge the fairy gems of the "Thousand and One Nights." Valleys, crevices, projections, every spot which the beams of the sun do not reach, turn into a blue which matches the azure of the sky, of ice, of lapis lazuli, of sapphire. The contrast of tone between the light and the shadow has an astonishing effect, — the mountain seems to have wrapped itself in changing, spangled, silver-ribbed silk. Little by little the rich colours die away and melt into violet half-tints, the shadows invade the lower slopes, the light withdraws to the highest summits and the whole plain has long been plunged in darkness when the silver diadem of the Sierra still sparkles in the clear sky, glowing in the last beam of the setting sun.

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

People walk up and down a few times more, and then scatter, some to take sherbet and agraz at Don Pedro Hurtado's café, where you get the best ices in Granada, others to go to a tertulia at the houses of their friends or acquaintance. This is the brightest and most animated time in Granada. The open-air shops of the aguadores and ice-cream venders are lighted up with an infinite number of lamps and lanterns. The street lamps and the lamps lighted in front of the statues of the Madonna rival the stars in number and brilliancy, and if it happens to be moonlight, you can easily read the smallest print; the light has turned blue instead of being yellow, and that is all.

We were soon well known in Granada, and led a most delightful life. It is impossible to be welcomed more cordially, frankly, and pleasantly. In five or six days we were quite intimate, and according to Spanish custom we were called by our first names. At Granada I was Don Teofilo, my comrade was Don Eugenio, and we were free to call by their names Carmen, Teresa, Gala, etc., the young ladies and girls in the houses in which we were received as guests. This familiarity goes very well with the most polished manners and the most respectful attentions. So every evening we went to a tertulia in one house or another from eight to midnight. The tertulias take place in the alabaster-columned patio adorned with its jet of water, the basin of which is surrounded by flower-pots and boxes of shrubs, on the leaves of which the drops of water fall with a pleasant sound. Five or six lamps are hung along the walls, sofas and straw or wicker-work chairs are placed in the galleries, the piano is in one corner, in another are the card-tables.

On entering, each guest greets the master and mistress of the house, who do not fail, after the usual exchange of civilities, to offer you a cup of chocolate which it is proper to refuse, and a cigarette which is occasionally accepted. Having fulfilled this duty, you go to the corner of the patio and join the group which most attracts you. The parents and elders play at trecillo; the young fellows talk with the girls, recite the verses they have written during the day, and are scolded and punished for crimes which they may have committed the day before, such as having danced too often with a pretty cousin or cast too bright a glance towards a forbidden balcony. If they have been very good, in exchange for the rose they have brought, they are given a carnation from the waist or from the hair, and a glance or a slight pressure of the fingers answers their clasp when the company ascends to the balcony to hear the band play the retreat.

Love-making seems to be the only occupation of Granada. You have not spoken more than two or three times to a girl before the whole city declares that you are engaged, and chaffs you about your pretended passion in the most innocent fashion, but nevertheless somewhat disquietingly, as it calls up visions of marriage. Gallantry is more apparent than real, for in spite of languorous glances, burning looks, tender and passionate conversation, sweet demonstrations, and the "darling" prefixed to your name, you must not imagine too readily that you are a lady-killer.

When conversation begins to fail, one of the gentlemen takes down a guitar and begins to sing, striking the strings with his nails and marking the rhythm with the palm of his hand on the body of the instrument, some bright Andalusian song or some comic stanzas, mingled with ays and olas quaintly modulated, which produce a singular effect. A lady sits down to the piano and plays a piece by Bellini, who seems to be a favourite composer among the Spaniards, or sings a ballad by Breton de los Herreros, the great ballad-writer of Madrid.

The evening closes with a little improvised dance, but they do not dance, alas, the jota, the fandango, or the bolero, these dances being left to the peasants, the servants, and the gipsies. Instead they have quadrilles and rigadoons, and occasionally waltzes. One evening, however, at our request, two young ladies of the family were kind enough to dance a bolero; but first they insisted on having the windows and also the door of the mansion closed, though these usually remained open, so greatly did they fear to be accused of bad taste and local colour. The Spaniards are generally annoyed when spoken to about cachuchas, castanets, majos, manolas, monks, smugglers, and bull-fights, though at bottom they are really very fond of them as national and characteristic. They ask you, with an air of annoyance, whether you think that they are not as civilised as you,—so far has the deplorable mania for the imitation of the English and the French penetrated everywhere. Spain at the present day is inimical to all colour and poetry. Of course it is to be understood that we are speaking of the so-called enlightened classes, the people who inhabit the cities.

The dancing over, you take leave of the masters of the house, saying to the lady, "A los pies de V'd," to the husband, "Beso á V'd la mano," to which they reply, "Buenas noches," and "Beso á V'd la suya," and on the threshold, as a last farewell, "Hasta mañana" (Till to-morrow), which is equivalent to asking you to come again. While quite familiar, the common people themselves, the peasants, and the rascals practise towards each other an exquisite politeness very different from the coarse manners of our rabble. It is true that a knife-thrust may follow on the heels of an offensive word, which makes people very circumspect. It is to be noticed that French politeness, formerly proverbial, departed since swords ceased to be worn; the laws against duelling will end by making us the most ill-mannered people in the world.

On the homeward way you meet under the windows and balconies the young gallants wrapped in their cloaks and busy in pilar la pamba, that is, in chatting with their betrothed through the gratings. These nocturnal conversations often last until two and three in the morning, which is not surprising since the Spaniards spend a portion of the day in sleeping. You may also happen upon a serenade composed of three or four musicians, but usually it is the lover alone, who sings couplets, accompanying himself upon the guitar, with his sombrero pulled down over his eyes and one foot placed on a stone or a post. Formerly two serenades in the same street would not have tolerated each other; the first-comer claimed the right to remain alone and forbade any other guitar than his own to strum in the silence of night. The claim was maintained with the sword or the knife, unless the watch came along; then the two rivals joined in charging the watch, leaving their private quarrel to be settled later. The susceptible character of serenaders has been much softened, and each one can scrape and hum, as the saying is, under the window of his fair in perfect peace and contentment.

If the night happens to be dark, you have to be careful not to step upon some worthy hidalgo rolled up in his cloak, which stands him in the way of house, bed, and garment. On summer nights the granite steps of the Theatre are covered with numbers of fellows who have no other home. Every one has his own step, which is like his apartment, and where one is sure to find him. Men sleep there under the blue vault of the sky with the stars for night-lights, safe from insects and from the stings of mosquitoes, thanks to the toughness of their tanned skins bronzed by the suns of Andalusia and as dark unquestionably as that of the darkest mulattoes.

We were so passionately fond of the Alhambra that, not satisfied with going there every day, we desired to live there altogether; not in the neighbouring houses, which are rented at very high prices to the English, but within the palace itself; and thanks to the protection of our Granada friends, we were told that, though a formal permission could not be granted to us, our presence there would not be taken notice of. We spent four days and four nights in the place, and they were unquestionably the most delightful days of my life.

To reach the Alhambra, we shall, if you please, cross the Bibarrambla Square, where the valiant Gozul the Moor formerly fought bulls, and the houses of which, with their balconies and look-outs in joiner-work, somewhat resemble chicken-coops. The fish-market is in one corner of the square, the centre of which is an open place surrounded with stone benches full of money-changers, vendors of alcarrazas (earthen jars), watermelons, linen stuffs, ballads, knives, chaplets and other small wares. The Zacatin, which has preserved its Moorish name, connects Bibarrambla Square with the New Square. In this street, parallel to which run lateral lanes and which is covered with sail-cloth awnings, the whole business of Granada is carried on with much animation and noise. Hatters, tailors, shoemakers, bakers, and cloth-dealers occupy shops which are as yet unacquainted with the refinements of modern luxury and recall the old shops of the Market Place in Paris. At all hours of the day there is a crowd in the Zacatin; now a group of Salamanca students on a journey, playing on the guitar, the tambourine, or castanets and triangles, as they sing songs full of fun and spirit; now a horde of gipsies with their blue dresses with large patterns spangled with stars, their long yellow shawls, their uncombed hair, great amber or coral necklaces around their necks; or else a long line of asses, laden with huge jars and driven by a Vega peasant as tanned as an African.

The Zacatin opens into the Plaza Nueva, one side of which is occupied by the splendid palace of the Chancery, noticeable for its columns, of the Rustic order, and the severe beauty of its arcades. Having crossed the square, you ascend the Calle de Gomerres, at the end of which you enter within the jurisdiction of the Alhambra, opposite the Granada Gate, called Bib Alanjar by the Moors, with, on the right, the Vermilion Towers, built, say the learned, on Phœnician sub-structures, and to-day inhabited by basket-makers and potters.

Before going farther we ought to warn our readers — who may think that our description, though scrupulously accurate, falls short of their ideas — that the Alhambra, the fortress-palace of the former Moorish kings, is not in the least like what one imagines. You expect to see terraces rising one above another, minarets with delicate tracery, and perspectives of innumerable pillars. There is nothing of all that in reality. From the outside all you see are great, massive towers the colour of brick or dust, built at various times by Arab princes; inside a succession of halls and galleries decorated with extreme delicacy, but lacking grandeur. Having made this reservation, we shall go on our way.

Having passed through the Granada Gate, you enter the precincts of the fortress and the jurisdiction of a separate governor. Two roads are cut through a high wood; let us take the left-hand one which leads by the Charles V fountain. It is the steeper, but the shorter and more picturesque. Brooks flow swiftly down pebbly beds and water the trees, which are almost all Northern, and the green foliage of which is most delightful to behold so close to Africa. The murmur of running water mingles with the sharp singing of hundreds of thousands of crickets, whose voice is never silent and which forcibly recalls you, in spite of the coolness of the place, to thoughts of the South and its torrid heat. Water bubbles up everywhere, under the trunks of the trees, through the courses of the old walls. The hotter it is, the more abundant are the springs, for they are fed by the mountain snows. The mingling of water, snow, and heat makes the Granada climate unparalleled in the world. It is a true terrestrial paradise, and without being a Moor, it may be said of us, when we are sunk in deep melancholy, what the Arab proverb says, "He is thinking of Granada."

---

At the top of the road, which keeps on ascending, you come to the great monumental fountain which forms a buttress and which is dedicated to the memory of Charles V, with no end of mottoes, arms, figures of Victory, imperial eagles, and medallions, in the rich and dull German-Roman taste. Two scutcheons bearing the arms of the house of Mondejar tell that Don Luis de Mendoza, Marquis of Mondejar, built this monument in honour of the red-bearded Cæsar. The fountain, which is of solid masonry, upholds the slope of the stair which leads to the Gate of Judgment by which the Alhambra proper is entered.

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

The Gate of Judgment was built by King Yûsuf Abul Hagiag about the year 1348. Its name comes from the custom of the Moslems to administer justice at the gate of their palace, a most majestic fashion which did not allow any one to enter the inner courts; for Royer-Collard's maxim, "Private life should be walled in," was invented centuries ago in the East, the land of the sun, whence all wisdom springs.

The Moorish king's structure might more properly be called a door than a gate, for in reality it is a huge, square door, fairly high, pierced by a great, horse-shoe arch, which acquires a somewhat repelling and cabalistic look from the hieroglyphics of the key and the hand carved on two separate stones. The key is a venerated symbol among the Arabs on account of a verse of the Koran beginning with these words, "He has opened," and it has a number of hieratical meanings. The hand is intended to ward off the evil eye, like the little coral hands which are worn in Naples in the shape of a charm or a breastpin to protect one against the same danger. There was an old saying that Granada would never be taken until the hand seized the key. To the shame of the prophet be it spoken, the two symbols are still in the same place, and Boabdil el Chico (as he was called on account of his small stature) uttered, outside the walls of conquered Granada that historic sigh, suspiro del Moro, which gave its name to one of the cliffs of the Sierra Elvira.

This crenellated, massive tower, glazed with orange and red, against a background of crude sky, with an abyss of vegetation behind it, the city on a precipice, and in the distance long mountain-chains veined with a thousand tints like African porphyry, forms a splendid and majestic entrance to the Arab palace.

Under the gate is installed a guard-room, and poor, ragged soldiers sleep at the same place where the Caliphs, seated on gold-brocaded divans, their black eyes motionless in their marble faces, their fingers lost in the flow of their silky beards, listened with dreamy and solemn looks to the complaints of the believers. An altar surmounted by an image of the Virgin is placed against the wall as if to sanctify at the very outset this former throne of the worshippers of Mahomet. Having traversed the gate, you enter a vast square called las Aljibes, in the centre of which is a cistern enclosed within a sort of wooden shed covered with esparto, under which you drink for a cuarto huge glasses of water as clear as a diamond, as cold as ice, and of most exquisite taste. The Quebrada, Homenaje, Armeria, and Vela Towers, — the bell in the Vela Tower announces the hour of the distribution of water, — on the stone parapets of which you can lean and admire the marvellous prospect which is unrolled before you, surround the square on three sides ; the other is filled up by the palace of Charles V, a vast monument of the time of the Renaissance, which would be admired anywhere else, but which one curses here, for one remembers that it covers an equal extent of the Alhambra, torn down purposely to make room for this huge pile. Yet the Alcala was designed by Alonzo Berruguete, and the trophies, the bassi-relievi, and the medallions of the façade have been carved by a skilful, bold, patient sculptor. The circular court with its marble columns, in which were to take place bull-fights, is unquestionably a magnificent piece of architecture, but it is out of place here.

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

The Alhambra is entered through a corridor in a corner of the palace of Charles V, and after a few turns, one reaches a great court called the Court of Myrtles (Patio de los Arrayanes), or the Court of the Reservoir (Alberca). On emerging from the dark passage into this bright space filled with light, it seems as if the wand of an enchanter has carried you into the East some four or five centuries ago. Time, which changes everything, has in no wise altered the aspect of the place, and one would not be in the least surprised did the Sultana Binder of Hearts and the Moor Tafi in his white mantle suddenly appear.

In the centre of the court has been dug a vast reservoir three or four feet deep, in the shape of a parallelogram bordered by hedges of myrtle and shrubs, terminating at each end in a sort of gallery with very slender columns which support Moorish arches of great lightness. Basins with jets of water which overflow into the reservoir by marble gutters, are placed under each gallery and make the decoration symmetrical. On the left are the archives and the room where, amid débris of all kinds, is relegated — to the shame of the people of Granada be it said — the magnificent Alhambra Vase, nearly four feet high, covered with ornaments and inscriptions, a monument of priceless value which would alone be the gem of a museum, and which Spanish carelessness allows to go to ruin in a vile corner. One of the wings which formed the handles was broken recently.

Passages leading to the old mosque, made into a church at the time of the Conquest under the invocation of Saint Mary of the Alhambra, are also on this side. On the right are the dwellings of the keepers, where the heads of some brown Andalusian servants, framed within a narrow Moorish window, produce a very satisfactory effect. At the back, above the ugly roof of round tiles which replaced the cedar beams and gilded tiles of the Arab roof, rises majestically the Comares Tower, the battlements of which stand out golden against the wondrously clear sky. This tower contains the Hall of the Ambassadors, and communicates with the Patio de los Arrayanes by an atrium called Sala de la Barca on account of the shape of the vaulting, which resembles the hull of a boat. This antechamber to the Hall of Ambassadors is worthy of its purpose. The bold arcades, the variety and interlacing of the arabesques, the inscriptions on the walls, the marvellous work of the stucco vaulting, which is as ornamented as the ceiling of a stalactite grotto, painted in blue, green, and red, of which the traces are still visible, form an ensemble delightfully quaint and naïve.

On either side of the door which leads to the Hall of Ambassadors, in the very jambs of the arcade itself, above the revetment of enamelled tiles — the brilliant coloured triangles of which adorn the lower portion of the walls — are hollowed out, in the shape of small chapels, two niches of white marble carved with wondrous delicacy. The Hall of the Ambassadors, one of the largest in the Alhambra, takes up the whole of the Comares Tower. The larch-wood roof presents the geometric combinations of which Arab architects were so fond. All the pieces are so arranged that the outer and the inner angles form an infinite variety of designs; the walls disappear under a network of ornament so close, so inextricably interlaced that it may best be compared to numerous pieces of lace placed one on top of another. Gothic architecture, with its lace-work of stone and its rose-window tracery, pales by the side of this. One of the characteristics of the Moorish style is that it has very few salient points and very few profiles. All this ornament extends over flat surfaces and has not much more than four or five inches relief. It is a sort of tapestry worked out on the wall itself. A peculiar characteristic marks it, — the use of writing as a decorative motive. It is true that Arabic writing, with its curves and mystic forms, lends itself admirably to such use. The inscriptions, which are almost always suras from the Koran or praises of the different princes who built and decorated the halls, run along the frieze, the lintels of the doors, and round the arches of the windows, mingling with flowers, scrolls, and all the wealth of Arab calligraphy. The inscriptions in the Hall of Ambassadors mean “Glory to God, power and riches to the believers,” or sing the praises of Abu Nazar, who, “had he been transported alive into heaven, would have caused the stars and the planets to pale,” a hyperbolical statement which seems to us rather too Eastern. Other inscriptions praise Abu Abd’ Allah, another sultan who built this part of the palace. The windows are covered with verses in honour of the clearness of the waters of the reservoir, the coolness of the shade of the shrubs, and the perfume of the flowers which adorn the Mexuar Court, which, as a matter of fact, you catch a glimpse of from the Hall of the Ambassadors through the doors and the columns of the gallery.

The loop-holes, with internal balconies, pierced at a great height from the ground, the timber roof without other decoration than zigzags and interlacings formed by the adjustment of the timbers, impart to the Hall of Ambassadors a more severe aspect than that of the other halls of the palace, and more in harmony with its purpose. From the end window there is a superb view over the Darro ravine.

Having completed this description, we have to destroy another illusion: all this magnificence is neither marble, alabaster, nor stone, but simply plaster. This greatly upsets the idea of fairy luxury which the mere name of the Alhambra awakens in the most commonplace imagination; and yet it is absolutely true. With the exception of the columns, usually cut out of one block and the height of which is scarce more than six or eight feet, and of a few blocks in the paving of the basins of the fountains and the small niches, there is not a single piece of marble used in the interior of the Alhambra. It is the same with the Generalife. No nation has carried farther than the Arabs the art of moulding, hardening, and carving plaster, which acquired in their hands the hardness of stucco without its unpleasant gloss. Most of these ornaments, therefore, are made in moulds and repeated without much expenditure of labour every time that symmetry calls for it. Nothing could be easier, therefore, than to reproduce accurately a hall in the Alhambra; all that would be necessary would be to take casts of all the motives of ornamentation. Two arcades in the Tribunal Hall that had fallen in were replaced by Granada workmen in a way that leaves absolutely nothing to be desired. If we were a millionaire, one of our fancies would be to have a duplicate of the Court of Lions erected in one of our parks.

From the Hall of Ambassadors is reached, through a comparatively modern passageway, the Tocador, or Queen's dressing-room (Peinador). This is a small building, situated on the top of a tower, from which one enjoys a marvellous panorama. At the entrance is noticed a slab of white marble pierced with small holes through which rose the smoke of perfumes burned below the floor. On the walls are still to be seen the fantastic frescoes, the work of Bartolome de Ragis, Alonzo Perez, and Juan de la Fuente. Along the frieze, amid groups of Cupids, are interlaced the monograms of Isabella and Philip V. It is difficult to imagine anything more dainty and delightful than this small room with its Moorish columns, its semicircular arches poised above an abyss of azure at the foot of which show the roofs of Granada, while the breeze wafts to it the perfumes of the Generalife, which is like a huge clump of rose-laurel bloom on the brow of the near hill, and the plaintive cry of the peacocks which wander about the dismantled walls. No description, no painting can approach the brilliancy, the luminosity, the vigour of the tones; the most ordinary tints acquire a richness equal to that of precious stones, and in the scale of colours every thing is of the same value. Towards the close of day, when the sun is low, marvellous effects occur. The mountains sparkle like vast heaps of rubies, topazes, and carbuncles; the spaces between are filled with a golden dust, and if, as often occurs in summer, the peasants are burning straw in the plain, the wisps of smoke which slowly rise heavenward are coloured by the rays of the setting sun with exquisite tints. I am surprised that Spanish painters should have as a general rule painted such dark pictures and have almost exclusively imitated Caravaggio and other sombre masters. The paintings of Decamps and Marilhat, which represent only Asiatic and African scenes, give a far more accurate idea of Spain than all the costly paintings brought back from the Peninsula.

---

We shall traverse without a stop the Lindaraja Garden, which now is nothing but waste ground strewn with débris, bristling with brambles; and we shall enter for a moment the Sultana's baths which are covered with mosaic patterns, formed of varnished earthen tiles embroidered with a filigree in plaster which would put to shame the most complicated madrepore. A fountain stands in the centre, two alcoves are cut in the wall. Here it was that the Binder of Hearts and Zobeide used to recline on gold-cloth carpets after having enjoyed the luxurious delight of an oriental bath. Some fifteen feet above the ground are still seen the tribunes or balconies where stood the players and singers. The baths themselves are great white-marble basins cut out of a single block, placed in small vaulted cabinets lighted by round or star-shaped traceried windows.

---

GRANADA

The English engravings and the numerous drawings of the Court of the Lions give a very incomplete and erroneous idea of it; they are almost all lacking in proportion, and on account of the minuteness rendered necessary by the infinite detail of Arab architecture, they make the monument appear much more important than it really is. The Court of the Lions is ninety-two feet long by fifty-two feet wide, and the galleries which surround it are not more than twenty-two feet high. They are formed of one hundred and twenty-four columns of white marble ranged in symmetrical disorder in groups of four and of three alternately. From these pillars, the highly ornamented capitals of which still bear traces of gilding and colours, spring stilted arches of extreme elegance and peculiar workmanship.

On entering, at the end of the parallelogram stands the Hall of the Tribunal, the vaulting of which contains an artistic work of great rarity and inestimable value in the shape of Arab paintings, the only ones,

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

perhaps, which have come down to us. One of them represents the Court of the Lions itself, with, the fountain easily recognisable, but gilded; some figures, which the state of decay of the painting does not allow one to make out distinctly, seem to be engaged in a joust or an assault at arms. The subject of the other is a sort of divan, at which are assembled the Moorish kings of Granada. Their white burnouses, their olive-coloured faces, their red lips and mysterious black eyes are still easily seen. These paintings, it is claimed, are on prepared leather pasted on cedar panels, and prove that the precept of the Koran which forbids the representation of living beings was not always scrupulously observed by the Moors, even did not the twelve lions of the fountain confirm this statement.

To the left, in the centre of the longer portion of the gallery, stands the Hall of the Two Sisters, which is the companion of the Hall of the Abencerrages. Its name comes from the two huge slabs of white Machael marble, of equal size and exactly alike, which are inserted in the pavement. The vaulting or cupola, which the Spaniards so appropriately term "half orange," is a wonder of work and patience; it is something like the combs of a beehive or the stalactites of a grotto, or a cluster of soap-bubbles which children blow with a straw. These myriads of diminutive vaults or domelets, three or four feet across, which spring one from another, crossing and breaking their edges, seem rather the product of a fortuitous crystallisation than the work of a human hand. Blue, red, and green still shine in the hollows of the mouldings almost as brilliantly as if they had just been laid on. The walls, like those in the Hall of the Ambassadors, are covered from the dado down with plaster embroidery of incredible delicacy and complexity; the lower portion is covered with glazed tiles, the black, green, and yellow corners of which form a mosaic pattern upon the white background. The centre of the hall, in accordance with the unchanging custom of the Arabs, whose dwellings seem to be nothing but great basins enriched, is occupied by a basin and a jet of water. There are four of these under the portico of the Tribune, an equal number under the entrance portico, another in the hall of the Abencerrages, without counting the Lion Fountain, which, not satisfied with pouring water out of the mouths of its twelve monsters, hurls towards heaven a torrent through the bulb which surmounts it.

The water from all these different fountains is led by gutters hollowed out in the pavement of the halls and the court to the foot of the Lion Fountain, where it empties into a subterranean vent. This is assuredly a dwelling where dust will not trouble one, and the wonder is how such rooms could be inhabited in winter. No doubt the great cedar gates were then closed, the marble pavement covered with thick rugs, and fires of fruit-pippins and scented wood lighted in the braseros; and thus the inhabitants awaited the return of the warm season, which is never long delayed in Granada.

We shall not describe the Hall of the Abencerrages, which is very similar to that of the Two Sisters and has nothing remarkable save its old lozenged wooden gate, which goes back to the time of the Moors. In the Alcazar at Seville there is another in exactly the same style.

The Lion Fountain enjoys, in Arab poetry, a marvellous reputation; there is no praise too great for these superb animals. For my part, I am bound to confess that it would be difficult to find anything less like lions than these works of African fancy. The paws are more like those rough pieces of wood that are put into the stomachs of cardboard dogs to preserve their equilibrium; the faces, rayed with cross-bars, no doubt intended to figure the moustaches, are exactly like the mouths of hippopotami; the eyes are of such primitive drawing that they recall the shapeless attempts of children: and yet these twelve monsters, if considered not as lions but as chimeras, as caprices of ornamentation, produce, with the basin which they upbear, a picturesque and elegant effect which enables one to understand their reputation and the praise contained in the Arabic inscription, in twenty-four lines of twenty-two syllables, engraved upon the sides of the basin into which falls the water from the upper basin. It was into this fountain that fell the heads of the thirty-six Abencerrages drawn into the trap by the Zegris. The other Abencerrages would all have suffered the same fate but for the devotion of a little page, who hastened, at the risk of his own life, to warn the survivors and prevent their entering the fatal court. At the bottom of the basin are pointed out great red stains, an indelible accusation left by the victims against their cruel executioners. Unfortunately, learned men pretend that the Abencerrages and the Zegris never existed. On this point I trust wholly to the ballads, the popular traditions, and the novels of Chateaubriand, and I am firmly convinced that the red stains are due to blood, and not to rust.

The Generalife is situated a short distance from the Alhambra upon a hump of the same mountain. It is reached by a sort of hollow road which crosses the los Molinos ravine, bordered with fig trees with enormous shining leaves, green oaks, pistachios, laurels, and rock roses, all growing with incredible richness. The ground on which you walk consists of yellow sand permeated with water and extraordinarily fertile. Nothing is more delightful than this road, which seems to be cut through an American virgin forest, so full of flowers and varied is it, so heavy is the perfume of the aromatic plants. Vines grow out of the cracks of the broken-down walls and hang their fanciful tendrils and their leaves, outlined like Arab ornaments, on every branch. The aloe opens out its fan of azure blades, the orange tree twists its knotty trunk and clings to the bricks of the escarpment. Everything blooms and flowers in a thick disorder full of delightful and unexpected happenings. A stray branch of jessamine mingles its white stars with the scarlet flowers of the pomegranate, and a cactus on one side of the road is, in spite of its thorns, embraced by a laurel on the other. Nature, left to herself, seems to become coquettish, and to insist on showing how far behind her is even the most exquisite and consummate art.

It is a fifteen minutes walk to the Generalife, which is a sort of country house of the Alhambra. The exterior, like that of all Eastern buildings, is exceedingly plain : high, windowless walls, surmounted by a terrace, with an arcaded gallery, and over all a small modern look-out. Nothing is left of the Generalife but arcades and great arabesque panels, unfortunately overlaid with whitewash, which is renewed with despairingly obstinate cleanliness. Little by little all the delicate grace, the marvellous modelling of this fairy architecture are vanishing, filling up and disappearing. What is now but a faintly vermiculated wall was formerly a piece of lace as delicate as the sheets of ivory which the patient Chinese carve into fans. The whitewasher's brush has destroyed more masterpieces than the scythe of Time, if we may use this mythological and worn-out comparison. In a fairly well preserved hall are to be seen a series of smoky portraits of the kings of Spain, which have no merit other than that which archæology bestows upon them.

The real charms of the Generalife are its gardens and its water-works. A marble-lined canal runs the whole length of the enclosure, and its full, rapid stream flows under a succession of arcades of foliage formed by colossal clipped yews; orange trees and cypresses are planted on either bank. At the foot of one of these cypresses, which is of monstrous size and which goes back to the time of the Moors, Boabdil's favourite, if the legend is to be believed, proved many a time that bolts and bars are but slight guarantees of the virtue of sultanas. What is quite certain is that the yew tree is very large and very old.

The perspective is closed by a galleried portico with jets of water and marble columns like the Patio de los Arrayanes at the Alhambra. The canal turns, forms a loop, and you enter other enclosures adorned with ponds, on the walls of which are the remains of frescoes of the sixteenth century representing rustic buildings and landscapes. In the centre of one of these ponds blooms, like a vast bouquet, a gigantic rose-laurel of incomparable beauty and brilliancy. When I saw it, it looked like an explosion of flowers, like a bouquet of vegetable fireworks, a splendid and vigorous mass of noisy freshness, if such a word may be applied to colours which would cause the most brilliant rose to pale. Its lovely flowers bloomed out with all the ardour of desire towards the pure light of heaven; its noble leaves, designed expressly by nature as a crown for gladiators, were laved by the spray of the jets of water and sparkled like emeralds in the sunshine. Nothing has ever given me such a deep sensation of beauty as that rose laurel in the Generalife.

The water is brought to the gardens by a sort of very steep slope with side walls that serve as weirs. Upon it are laid runlets formed of great hollow tiles, down which the brooks rush with the brightest and most lifelike ripple. On every terrace numerous jets spring from the centre of small basins and throw their crystal aigrettes up into the thick foliage of the laurel wood, the branches of which are entwined above them. The mountain streams with water on every hand, a spring wells up at every step, and you constantly hear the near murmur of some brooklet turned from its course to feed a fountain or to bear refreshments to a tree. The Arabs carried the art of irrigation to a very high degree; their hydraulic works testify to a most advanced stage of civilisation, and it is to these works that Granada owes its position as the paradise of Spain and that it enjoys eternal spring in an African temperature. A branch of the Darro was deflected by the Arabs and brought more than six miles to the hill of the Alhambra.

From the look-out on the Generalife the plan of the Alhambra, with its bold, reddish, half-ruined towers and its walls which ascend and descend, following the outlines of the hill, can be plainly perceived. The palace of Charles V, which is not visible from the city, stands out, a square and robust mass gilded by the sun, against the damask sides of the Sierra Nevada, the white crests of which show in startling outline against the sky. The spire of Santa Maria projects its Christian lines above the Moorish crenellations. A few cypresses grow in the crevices of the walls, their dark foliage confronting one in the midst of all that light and azure like a sad thought in a joyous play. The slopes of the hill towards the Darro and the ravine of los Molinos disappear in an ocean of verdure. It is one of the loveliest prospects that can be imagined. On the other side, by way of contrast to this fresh beauty, rises a bare, burnt, tawny mountain, spotted with ochre and sienna tones, which is called the Silla del Moro, from the remains of buildings upon its summit. Thence it was that King Boabdil watched the Arab cavaliers tilt in the Vega with the Christian knights. The remembrance of the Moors is still living in Granada. One would think that it was only yesterday that they quitted the city, and if one may judge by what they left behind, it is a great pity that they did so. What southern Spain needs is African, and not European civilisation, for the latter is not in harmony with the heat of the climate and the passions which it inspires.

Monte Sagrado, which contains the miraculously discovered crypts, is not very interesting. It is a convent with a commonplace church, under which the crypts are dug; nor do the crypts make any strong impression. They consist of small, narrow passages seven or eight feet in height. Within niches made for the purpose are placed altars adorned with more devotion than taste. In these niches, behind gratings, are placed the reliquaries and the bones of the holy personages. I looked for a subterranean, obscure, mysterious, almost terrifying church, with squat pillars and low vaulting, lighted by a dim, distant lamp, — something resembling the ancient catacombs; and I was greatly surprised at the clean, coquettish aspect of this whitewashed crypt lighted by air holes like a cellar; for we rather superficial Catholics need the picturesque to attain to religious feeling. The devotee does not think much of the play of light and shade, the more or less correct proportions of the architecture; he knows that under that somewhat shapeless altar are concealed the bones of a saint who died for the faith he professes: that is enough for him.

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

The Carthusian convent, emptied of its monks as all Spanish convents now are, is a superb building, and its withdrawal from its original purpose is most regrettable. We have never quite understood what harm could be done by cenobites, cloistered in a voluntary prison and living an austere, prayerful life, especially in a country like Spain, where certainly there is no lack of ground.

The portal of the church is reached by a double staircase. It is ornamented by a statue of Saint Bruno in white marble, which is rather fine. The decoration of the church is curious. It consists of stucco arabesques absolutely marvellous for the variety and the invention of the motives. It seems as though the architect had intended to repeat in a different style the lightness and complexity of the lace-work in the Alhambra. There is not a place the size of the hand in that vast nave which is not flowered, damascened, foliated, lined, and enriched. It is enough to drive mad any one who should attempt to make an accurate drawing of it. The choir is covered with precious porphyry and marbles. A few indifferent paintings are hung here and there along the walls, and make you regret the portions they conceal.

The graveyard is near the church. In accordance with Carthusian use, no tomb or cross marks the place where sleep the dead. The cells are ranged around the cemetery, and each has a little garden. In a plot of ground planted with trees, which no doubt served as a walk for the monks, I was shown a sort of a fish-pond with sloping stone margins, on which some dozens of turtles were awkwardly dragging themselves, drinking in the sunshine and quite happy at being henceforth safe from the stewpan. The Carthusian rule forbids the eating of meat, and the turtle is considered a fish by casuists. These were used to feed the monks; the Revolution saved them.

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

Since we are busy visiting convents, let us, if you please, enter the monastery of Saint John the Divine. The cloister is most peculiar, and in the very worst of bad taste. The walls, painted in fresco, represent different fine actions in the life of Saint John the Divine, framed in grotesque and fantastic ornaments which surpass the most extravagant and curious deformities of Japanese monsters and Chinese grotesque figures. There are sirens playing on viols, female apes at their toilet, miraculous fishes in impossible waves; flowers that look like birds, and birds that look like flowers; mirrors in the shape of lozenges, china plaques, love-nets, — in a word, an indescribable labyrinth.

The church, which happily belongs to another age, is gilded almost all over. The reredos, supported by columns of the Salomonic order, has a rich and majestic effect.

I saw in this church a striking spectacle, — an old woman crawling on her knees from the gate to the altar. Her arms were stiffly extended like the arms of a cross, her head thrown back, her eyes turned up so much that only the whites of them were visible, her lips drawn over her teeth, her face of a shining lead-colour; she was in a state of ecstasy carried to the point of catalepsy. Never did Zurbaran paint anything more ascetic and fuller of feverish devotion. She was fulfilling a penance imposed upon her by her confessor, and had eight more days of it.

The convent of San Jeronimo, now transformed into a barracks, contains a Gothic cloister with two stories of arcades of remarkable character and beauty. The capitals of the pillars are ornamented with fantastic foliage and animals of charming invention and exquisite workmanship. The profaned and deserted church has the peculiarity that the architectural ornaments and reliefs are painted in grisaille instead of being real. Gonsalvo de Cordova, called the Great Captain is buried here. His sword was formerly preserved in this place, but recently it was stolen and sold for two or three douros, — about the worth of the silver ornaments of the hilt. It is in this way that many things precious and valuable as souvenirs or as works of art have disappeared without greater profit to the thieves than the pleasure of wrong-doing. It seems to me that our revolution might surely have been imitated in something else than its stupid vandalism. This was impressed on me as I visited the former convent of Saint Dominic in Antequeruela. The chapel is decorated with an incredible excess of gewgaws and gilding. Everywhere are twisted pillars, volutes, acanthus leaves, veneering of coloured breccia, glass mosaic, parquetry of mother-of-pearl, crystals, bevelled mirrors, radiant suns, transparencies, — in a word, all that the unsettled taste of the eighteenth century and the dislike of the straight line can inspire in the way of disorderly, deformed, eccentric, and misshapen.

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

The library, which has been preserved, contains almost exclusively folio and quarto volumes bound in white vellum, the title written in black or red ink. Most of the books are treatises on theology, dissertations on casuistry, and other scholastic works not very interesting to mere men of letters. In the convent has also been brought together a collection of paintings drawn from monasteries closed or destroyed, in which, save for some fine ascetic heads and a few martyrdoms that seem to have been painted by executioners, so remarkable is the knowledge of tortures which they display, there is nothing particularly worthy of note ; but it proves that the devastators were experts in painting, for they knew very well how to keep for themselves whatever was good. The courts and cloisters are admirably cool, and adorned with orange trees and flowers. How wonderfully everything in them conduces to reverie, meditation, and study, and what a pity that the convents were ever inhabited by monks instead of poets! The gardens, left to themselves, have assumed a wild and picturesque aspect, a luxuriant vegetation invades the walks, nature everywhere resumes possession of its rights. It replaces every stone that falls by a clump of grass or a tuft of flowers. The most noticeable thing in the gardens is a walk of huge laurels, which form an arbour, paved with white marble slabs and provided on either side with a long marble bench with inclined back. Jets of water, placed at intervals, maintain coolness under this thick, green vault, from the end of which one has a magnificent prospect in the direction of the Sierra Nevada through a charming Moorish look-out which forms part of the remains of an old Arab palace enclosed within the convent. This look-out communicates, it is said, with the Alhambra, from which it is rather distant, by a long subterranean passage. The belief in such passages is deeply rooted in Granada, where the most insignificant

GRANADA

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

---

Moorish ruin is always believed to possess fifteen or eighteen miles of underground passages, and a hidden treasure which is defended by a spell.

We often repaired to Santo Domingo to sit down in the shade of the laurels and bathe in the piscina.

This is about all that is worth seeing during a stay of a few weeks in Granada. Museums are few; the theatre is closed during the summer; the bull-fight arena is not regularly used; there are no casinos, no public establishments; French and foreign papers are to be found only at the Lyceum, the members of which have meetings at stated times, when speeches are made, verse is recited or sung, or comedies, composed usually by some young poet belonging to the society, are performed.

Every one is conscientiously occupied in doing nothing; love-making, the smoking of cigarettes, the composing of quadrilles and stanzas, and especially card-playing suffice to fill life pleasantly, and there is no sign of that furious hurry, of the need of moving, of bustling around, which possesses the people of the North. The Spaniards strike me as being very philosophical; they attach but slight importance to material things, and comfort is a matter of profound indifference to them. The innumerable factitious needs which Northern civilisation has given birth to appear to them puerile and troublesome. Of course, not having to contend with a climate, they do not envy the comforts of the English home. What do they care whether the windows are tight, when they would willingly open them and create a draught if they could only get hold of it? Favoured by a lovely climate, they have reduced living to its simplest expression; their sobriety and moderation give them great liberty,—they have time to live, and we can scarcely say as much. The Spaniards do not understand why one should work first in order to rest afterwards; they prefer to do the opposite thing, and it does appear to me the wiser course. A workman who has earned a few reales throws his handsome embroidered jacket over his shoulder, takes his guitar and goes to dance or flirt with the majos of his acquaintance until he has not a penny left; then he goes back to work. An Andalusian can live luxuriously upon three or four pence a day. With that he can have very white bread, a huge slice of watermelon, and a small glass of anisette; his lodging costs him nothing but the trouble of stretching his cloak on the ground under some portico or the arch of a bridge. Generally Spaniards look upon work as humiliating and unworthy of a free man, a very natural and very reasonable idea in my opinion, since God, when He sought to punish man for his disobedience, found no greater penalty than to compel him to earn his bread by the sweat of his brow. Pleasures won, as ours, by dint of labour, fatigue, tension of mind and assiduity seem to them far too costly. Like all primitive people close to a state of nature, they have a clearness of judgment which makes them despise conventional enjoyments. To men who have just come from Paris or London, those two whirlpools of devouring activity and feverish, over-excited life, existence at Granada is a strange spectacle: it is all leisure, filled with conversation, walking, music, dancing. The happy calm of the faces, the tranquil dignity of the appearance is surprising; no one has the busy look which passers-by wear on the streets of Paris; every one goes gently along, choosing the shady side, stopping to chat with his friends, and in no hurry to reach his destination. The certainty that they can make no money destroys all ambition. No career is open to young men. The most adventurous go to Manila or Havana or enter the army, but thanks to the wretched condition of the finances, they remain sometimes for many a year without getting any pay. Convinced of the uselessness of effort, they do not attempt impossible fortunes and spend their time in a delightful idleness which the beauty of the country and the warmth of the climate greatly favour.

GRANADA

GRANADA

I have not had much experience of Spanish pride. There is nothing so deceitful as the reputation which is given to individuals and nations. I found the Spaniards, on the contrary, extremely simple and kindly. Spain is the true country of equality, not in words, perhaps, but in fact. The meanest beggar lights his cigar from the cigar of the nobleman, who allows him to do so without the least affectation of condescension; the marchioness smilingly steps over the bodies of the rascals sleeping across her door, and when travelling she does not object to drinking out of the same glass as the mayoral, the zagal, and the escopetero who are conducting her. Strangers find it very difficult to fall in with these familiar ways, especially the English. Servants are treated with a gentle familiarity far different from our affected politeness, which seems to recall at every word the inferiority of their position. Of course these remarks, like rules, are subject to numerous exceptions ; no doubt there are many active, hard-working Spaniards who enjoy all the refinements of life ; but the impression stated is the one which a traveller receives after a stay of some time in the country, — an impression which is often more correct than that of a native observer, who is less sensitive to the novelty of manners.

MALAGA

---

A PIECE of news well calculated to excite a whole Spanish city had suddenly spread through Granada to the great delight of the dilettanti. The new circus at Malaga was at last finished, after having cost the contractor five million reales, and in order to inaugurate it solemnly by fights worthy of the finest period of the art, the great Montes of Chiclana had been engaged with his quadrille, and was to perform on three successive days, — Montes, the first swordsman in Spain, the brilliant successor of Romero and Pepe Illo. We had already been present at several bull-fights, but we had not been fortunate enough to see Montes, — his political opinions prevented his appearing at Madrid, — and to leave Spain without having seen Montes is just as inexcusably barbarous as to leave Paris without having seen Rachel perform. Although Cordova was next on our itinerary, we could not resist the temptation to make a dash to Malaga, in spite of the bad roads and the short time at our disposal.

---

---

There is no stage-coach plying between Granada and Malaga; the only transport consists of galleys or mules. We chose the latter as being surer and quicker, for we were to take to cross-roads at Alpujarras in order to reach Malaga on the very morning of the bull-fight.

Our Granada friends told us of a cosario or train-driver called Lanza, a handsome fellow, a very honest man, and most intimate with the bandits. In France this would be a poor recommendation, but it is quite otherwise beyond the Pyrenees. Muleteers and galley drivers are acquainted with the brigands, strike bargains with them, and in consideration of a tax of so much per head on each traveller or so much for a train, according to circumstances, they have a free passage and are not stopped. These bargains are scrupulously kept by both sides. When the leader of the band submits and is amnestied, or for any other reason sells out to some one else the stock in trade and goodwill of his business, he takes care to officially introduce to his successor the cosarios who are paying blackmail to him, so that they may not be inadvertently troubled. In this way travellers are assured of not being robbed, and the bandits avoid the risk of an attack and a fight, which is often dangerous. Everybody benefits by the arrangement.

One night, between Alhama and Velez, our cosario was dozing on the neck of his mule at the tail end of his train, when suddenly shrill cries awakened him. He saw trabucos gleaming by the roadside. There could be no doubt about it, the convoy was attacked. Greatly surprised, he sprang off his mule, threw up with his hand the muzzles of the muskets, and spoke his name. "Oh, forgive us, Señor Lanza," said the brigands, very much ashamed; "we did not recognise you. We are worthy people and incapable of such indelicacy. We have too much honour to take even a single cigar from you."

If you do not happen to be travelling with a man who is known on the road, you must have a numerous escort armed to the teeth; which is expensive and much less safe, for generally the escopeteros are retired brigands.

It is customary in Andalusia, when travelling on horseback and going to a bull-fight, to wear the national costume; so our little caravan was quite picturesque and looked uncommonly well as it left Granada. Joyfully seizing this opportunity of putting on a fancy dress outside of Carnival time, and of abandoning for a season the French costume, I had donned my majo dress, pointed hat, embroidered jacket, velvet waistcoat with filigree buttons, red silk sash, knee-breeches and gaiters showing the leg. My companion wore his costume of green velvet and Cordova leather. Others wore the montera, a black jacket, and black breeches embroidered in silk of the same colour, with yellow cravat and sash. Lanza was remarkable for the splendour of his silver buttons, which were reale pieces soldered to a hook, and for the flat silk braid of his second jacket which he carried on his shoulder like a hussar's dolman.

The mule which had been given to me was clipped half-way down, which enabled me to study its anatomy as conveniently as if it were skinned. The saddle was composed of two striped blankets folded double so as to diminish as much as possible the asperities of the vertebræ and the slope of the backbone. On either of its sides hung, by way of stirrups, a couple of wooden troughs, looking very much like rat traps. Its headgear was so laden with pompons, tufts, and gewgaws that it was difficult to perceive through the maze the harsh, discontented profile of the ill-tempered animal. It is when travelling that the Spaniards assume their old characteristics and throw off all imitation of foreign ways. The national character reappears in its entirety in those trains which cross the mountains and which cannot be very different from the caravans that traverse the desert. The roughness of the track, the wild grandeur of the landscape, the picturesque costumes of the arrieros, the quaint harness of the mules, the horses, and the asses walking in a long file, take you thousands of miles away from civilisation. Then travelling becomes a real thing, an action in which you have a part. In a stage-coach you are not a man, you are merely an inert object, and really there is not much difference between your trunk and yourself. You are thrown from one side to the other, that is all; you might just as well remain at home. The pleasure of travelling lies in difficulty, fatigue, and danger even. What pleasure can there be in an excursion when you are always sure to reach the end, to find horses ready, a soft bed, and all the comforts which you can enjoy at home? One of the great drawbacks of modern life is the lack of unexpectedness and of adventures; everything is so well regulated, so well arranged, so well conducted that the element of chance is eliminated. With another century of improvement, every one of us will be able to see from his birth everything that will happen to him to the day of his death. The human will will be entirely annihilated; there will be no more crime, no more virtue, no more individuality, no more originality. No one will be able to distinguish a Russian from a Spaniard, an Englishman from a Chinaman, a Frenchman from an American. People will not even be able to recognise one another, for everybody will look alike. Then an immense weariness will fall upon the universe, and suicide will decimate the population of the earth, for the chief motive of life, curiosity, will have been extinguished. A journey in Spain is still a perilous and romantic enterprise. You must run risks, be brave, patient, and strong; you have to venture your life at every step; the least inconveniences are privations of all sorts, the lack of things most indispensable to life; the dangerous roads, which are absolutely impracticable for any one else but Andalusian muleteers; the infernal heat; a sun which nearly burns up your brain; and in addition you have to contend with a whole rascally race of rebels, robbers, innkeepers, whose probity is graduated according to the number of rifles which you have with you; danger surrounds you, follows you, precedes you. You hear whispered around you terrible, mysterious stories. Yesterday the bandits supped in that posada; a caravan has been carried away into the mountains by the brigands to be ransomed; Palillos is in ambush at such a place where you must pass. No doubt there is much exaggeration, yet, incredulous as one may be, you have to believe a little when at every turn of the road you see wooden crosses with inscriptions such as: "Aqui mataron á un hombre." "Acqui murio de manpairada."

---

MALAGA

We left Granada in the evening and we were to travel all night. Soon the moon rose and its silvery rays fell upon the slopes; the shadows of the rocks grew longer and fell in strange shapes upon the road which we were following, producing singularly poetical effects. We could hear the bells of the asses which had started earlier with our luggage tinkling in the distance, or the mozo de mulas singing a love song in the prolonged notes which are always so poetical at night in the mountains.

We soon passed Cacin, where we forded a pretty

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

torrent a few inches in depth, the clear waters of which shimmered over the sand like the scales of a fish, and rushed like an avalanche of silver spangles down the steep mountain-slope.

Beyond Cacin the road became atrocious. Our mules sank in the loose stones up to the girths, striking sparks every time they put down their feet. We kept ascending and descending, following the edge of precipices, winding along or taking short cuts, for we were in the Alpujarres, inaccessible solitudes, steep, dread mountains, whence the Moors, it is said, were never completely expelled, and where, concealed from all eyes, live to this day some thousands of their descendants.

We were greatly startled at a turn in the road. We saw in the bright moonlight seven tall fellows draped in long mantles in the centre of the road. Our long expected adventure had at last turned up in the most romantic fashion. Unfortunately the bandits saluted us very politely with a respectful "God be with you." They were the very opposite of robbers, being a detachment of constabulary. Oh, what a bitter deception it was for two enthusiastic young travellers who would willingly have paid for an adventure at the cost of their luggage! We were to sleep in a small town called Alhama, perched like an eyrie on the summit of a cliff. Most picturesque are the sudden turns of the road leading to the Falcon's eyrie, as it winds through the uneven ground. We reached Alhama at about two o'clock in the morning, thirsty, hungry, and tired out. Three or four jars of water quenched our thirst, our hunger was appeased by a tomato omelet which, considering it was in Spain, did not contain too many feathers. A pretty stony mattress, not unlike a bag of walnuts, was stretched on the ground and undertook to rest us. In two minutes I slept — and my companion carefully imitated me — the sleep said to be that of the just. Day found us in the same attitude, as motionless as bars of lead.

The heat was frightful; nevertheless, I bravely threw my jacket on my shoulder and went for a turn through the streets of Alhama. The sky was like molten metal, the paving-stones shone as if they had been waxed and polished, the whitewashed walls sparkled like mica. A pitiless, blinding light penetrated everywhere. Shutters and doors cracked, the ground was creviced, the vine branches were twisted like green wood in a fire. In addition there was the reflection from the neighbouring rocks, which like burning mirrors sent back the sunbeams more burning yet. To complete my torture, I had on thin-soled shoes, through which the pavement scorched the soles of my feet. There was not a breath of air, not enough to move a bit of down. Nothing gloomier, sadder, and wilder can be imagined. As I wandered at haphazard through the deserted streets, I saw chalky walls pierced with few windows, closed with wooden shutters most African in aspect. I reached the main square, which is quaintly picturesque, without meeting, I will not say a soul, but not even a body. It is spanned by the stone arches of an aqueduct. A plateau cut out of the summit of the mountain forms the face of it; it has no other pavement than the rock itself, which is grooved to prevent slipping. The whole of one side of the square is precipitous and looks down bottomless abysses, where one catches a glimpse of groups of trees and of mills driven by a torrent which looks like soapsuds so fiercely does it froth.

The caravan started again along stretches of most picturesque roads on which mules alone could possibly make their way. I let the bridle lie upon my animal's neck, thinking it was more capable of taking care of itself, and trusting entirely to it to get through difficult places.

We were travelling through a regular Campo Santo. The crosses in memory of murders became frightfully frequent. In certain places we counted as many as three or four within a hundred yards. It was no longer a road, it was a cemetery. It must be confessed, however, that if we had in France the habit of perpetuating the remembrance of violent deaths by means of crosses, there are certain parts of Paris which could rival the Velez-Malaga road. Several of these sinister monuments bore dates already old; all the same they keep a traveller's imagination on tenter-hooks and make him attentive to the slightest sound. He remains constantly on the watch and is never bored for a moment.

Having passed through the defiles, the crosses became somewhat rarer. We now travelled through a mountain landscape of grand, severe aspect; the summits hidden in vast archipelagoes of vapour; the country entirely deserted; no human dwelling save the reed hut of a brandy seller. The brandy is colourless, and is drunk in long glasses filled with water which it turns white, as eau de Cologne might do.

The weather was heavy and stormy, and the heat suffocating. A few drops—the only drops which had fallen for four months from that implacable, lapis-lazuli sky—spotted the thirsty ground and made it look like a panther's skin. The rain could not make up its mind to come down, and the sultry vault resumed its changeless serenity. The sky was so constantly blue during my stay in Spain that I find in my note book this remark, "I have seen a white cloud"—as if it were something worthy of note. We Northerners, whose mist-laden skies offer a constant change of form and colour, where the wind builds cloud-mountains, islands, and palaces, which it incessantly destroys to rebuild them elsewhere, cannot have any idea of the deep melancholy caused by an azure as uniform as eternity, which is ever spread over one's head. In a small village that we traversed everybody was out of doors to enjoy the rain, as with us people go in doors in order to keep out of it.

The night had come on without any twilight, almost suddenly, as it does in hot countries, and we could not be very far from Velez-Malaga, the place where we were to sleep. The slopes of the mountains became less steep and ended in small, pebbly plains traversed by brooks fifteen or twenty yards wide and a foot in depth, edged with giant reeds. Of a truth, the place is wondrously lonely and well adapted for ambush.

It was eleven when we reached Velez-Malaga, where every window shone brightly and which was full of songs and the sound of guitars. Maidens seated on balconies sang couplets which their betrothed accompanied from below. With every stanza came bursts of laughter, shouts, and endless applause. Other groups were dancing the cachucha, the fandango, and the jota at the corners of the streets. The guitars buzzed low like bees, the castanets clattered and clinked; all was joy and music. It would seem as though pleasure were the only serious thing with Spaniards; they give themselves up to it with admirable freedom, ease, and spirit. No nation seems less unhappy, and a stranger really finds it difficult to believe, when he is traversing the Peninsula, that great political events are happening, and to imagine that it is a country desolated and ravaged by ten years of civil war. Our peasants are far from possessing the happy carelessness, the jovial airs, and the elegant costumes of the Andalusian majos. They are greatly inferior in education. Almost all Spanish peasants can read, and know by heart poetry which they recite or sing without changing the time; they are all thorough horsemen and skilled in handling the knife and the rifle. It is true that the wondrous fertility of the soil and the perfection of the climate save them from that brutalising labour which in less favoured countries reduces man to the condition of a beast of burden or of a machine, and robs him of those gifts of God, strength and beauty.

It was with deep pleasure that I fastened my mule to the wall of the posada. Our supper was most simple. All the maids and all the boys of the inn had gone to the dance, and we had to be satisfied with a simple gaspacho. This deserves a special description. Water is poured into a soup tureen, a drop of vinegar is added, with garlic, onions cut into four pieces, slices of cucumber, a few bits of pimento, a pinch of salt. Then slices of bread are allowed to soak in this delectable mixture, which is served cold. With us any decent dog would refuse to put his nose to such a mess, yet it is a favourite dish with the Andalusians, and the prettiest women do not hesitate to swallow in the evening great platefuls of this infernal soup. The gaspacho is stated to be very refreshing, — an opinion which seems to us somewhat bold; but, strange as it may seem the first time you taste it, you end by getting used to it and even by liking it. By a compensation of Providence we had, to wash down this meagre repast, a great carafe full of excellent dry Malaga wine, which we conscientiously drank to the very last drop, and which restored our strength, exhausted by nine hours' travelling over atrocious roads and in a heat like that of a lime-kiln.

At three o'clock the mule train started again. The sky was cloudy, and a hot mist concealed the horizon. A damp air gave token of the nearness of the sea, which soon showed against the sky like a cold blue streak. A few flecks of foam showed here and there, and the waves rolled on the fine sand in great, regular curves. To our right rose high cliffs. Sometimes the rocks left us free passage, sometimes they barred our path and we had to ride around them. The straight line is not much employed on Spanish roads; obstacles would be so difficult to remove that it is better to turn than to overcome them. The famous saying, linea recta brevissima, would be wholly inaccurate here.

---

As the sun rose it drove away the vapours as if they were smoke. The heavens and the sea resumed their rivalry in blue, in which it may be said that neither is superior. The cliffs began to take on their burnished gold, orange, amethyst, and smoky topaz tints; the sand turned to dust and the water shimmered under the intense light. Far, far away, almost on the horizon, five sail of fishing-boats fluttered in the wind like doves' wings. Here and there showed upon the gentler slopes little houses white as sugar, flat-roofed and with a sort of peristyle formed by an arbour supported at each end by a square pillar, and in the centre by a massive Egyptian-looking pylon. The aguardiente shops were becoming numerous; still built of reeds, but better-looking, with whitewashed counters on which were daubed a few red streaks. The road, now following a distinct line, was edged with a border of cacti and aloes, broken here and there by the gardens of houses, in front of which women were mending nets and playing with little naked children, who, as they saw us pass by on our mules, shouted after us, "Toro! toro!" Our majo costumes caused us to be mistaken for owners of ganaderias or for toreros of Montes' quadrille.

M A L A G A

Chariots dragged by oxen and files of donkeys became more and more numerous. The traffic which is always met with in the neighbourhood of a great city was already evident. From all sides came trains of mules bearing spectators bound for the bull-fight. Aficionados are, as regards their vehement enthusiasm, as far above dilettanti as a bull-fight is above an operatic performance. Nothing can stop them, neither heat nor obstacles, nor the dangers of the trip. Provided they can get there and have a place near the fence, so as to be able to strike with their hand the quarters of the bull, they consider themselves repaid for their fatigue. Where is the tragic or comic author who can boast of proving such an attraction?

Nothing more picturesque and strange than the environs of Malaga can be imagined: they are almost African. The dazzling whiteness of the houses, the dark blue colour of the sea, the blinding intensity of the light, all combine to produce the same illusion. On either side of the road rise huge aloes, waving their blade-like leaves, gigantic cacti with broad, verdigrised palettes and misshapen trunks twisted hideously like monstrous boas, like the backbone of a stranded cachalot. Here and there the shaft of a palm springs up, spreading its lovely crown of foliage by the side of a European tree amazed at its neighbour and troubled at seeing the mighty African vegetation growing at its feet.

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

A slender white tower showed against the blue of the sky. It was the Malaga lighthouse; we had reached our destination.

It was about eight o'clock in the morning, and the town was very busy: sailors coming and going, loading and unloading ships anchored in the harbour, with an animation rarely met with in a Spanish town; women, their heads and busts covered with great scarlet shawls which admirably set off their Moorish faces, were walking swiftly, dragging along a child either naked or clothed merely in a shirt: the men, draped in their cloaks, or their jackets over their shoulders, hastened their steps, and every one was going in the same direction, — that is, to the bull-fight. What most struck me in this motley crowd was six negro galley-slaves dragging a chariot. They were of gigantic stature, with monstrous faces, so savage and so little human, marked with such bestial ferocity, that I was terrified at the sight of them as if I had met six tigers. The sort of linen gown which they wore gave them a still more diabolical and fantastic appearance. I know not why they had been sent to the galleys, but I should have sent them there for the mere crime of having such faces.

We stopped at the Three Kings Parador, — a comparatively comfortable house, shaded by a beautiful vine the leaves of which clustered on the iron-work of the balcony, and provided with a great room in which the hostess sat in state behind a counter laden with china, quite as if it were a Paris café. A very pretty maid, a delightful specimen of the beautiful women of Malaga, who are famous throughout Spain, showed us to our rooms, and caused us lively anxiety for a moment by telling us that every seat for the bull-fight was sold, and that we should find it very difficult to obtain any. Fortunately our cosario, Lanza, found us a couple of reserved seats, — on the sunny side, it is true, but we did not care for that. We had long since sacrificed our complexion, and one more layer of tan upon our brown and yellow faces would matter little.

The fights were to go on for three successive days. During our first breakfast a number of travelling students came in. There were four of them, and they resembled more the models of Ribera and Murillo than divinity students, — so ragged, unshod, and filthy were they. They sang comic songs, accompanying themselves on the tambourine, the triangles, and the castanets.

The bull-fight was appointed to begin at five o'clock, but we were advised to go at about one, because the passageways would soon be crowded and we should be unable to reach our stalls, although these were reserved; so we ate our lunch in haste and started for the Plaza de Toros, preceded by our guide Antonio, a tall, thin chap whose bright red sash, pulled exceedingly tight, still further set off his extreme thinness, which he comically attributed to disappointed love. The streets were filled with a crowd that grew denser as we approached the circus. Aguadores, sellers of iced cebada, vendors of paper fans and parasols, cigar sellers, drivers of calesas all combined to make a terrific crowd. A vague rumour hovered over the city like a cloud of noise.

After many twistings and turnings in the narrow, labyrinthine streets, we at last reached the wished-for place, which is in no wise handsome externally. A detachment of soldiers had great difficulty in keeping back the crowd. Though it was scarcely one o'clock the benches were already filled from top to bottom, and it was only by dint of using our fists and our tongues that we succeeded in reaching our stalls. The Malaga amphitheatre is of a size which really recalls the great amphitheatres of antiquity; it can contain twelve or fifteen thousand spectators and rises to the height of a five-story dwelling. This suggests what the Roman arenas must have been, and the attraction of those terrible games in which men fought against wild beasts before a whole people. No stranger and more gorgeous spectacle can be imagined than these vast benches covered with an impatient crowd, which sought to allay the weariness of waiting by all sorts of jokes of the most piquant originality. Modern dresses were very infrequent, and those who wore them were received with shouts of laughter, roars, and hisses; so the view was greatly improved, for the bright-coloured jackets and sashes, the scarlet shawls of the women, and the green and yellow striped fans saved the crowd from that dull, dark aspect which it always has with us.

There was a fairly large number of women, and I noticed many very pretty ones. A Malaga woman is known by the uniform golden pallor of her complexion, her cheeks being no more coloured than her brow, by the long oval face, the rich redness of her lips, the delicate outline of her nose, and the brilliancy of her Arab eyes which might easily be supposed painted with henna, so delicate and long are the eyelashes, especially towards the temples. I do not know whether the stiff folds of the red drapery which frames in their faces is the cause of their serious and passionate look, which smacks so much of the East, and which the daintier, more graceful, more coquettish women of Madrid, of Granada, and of Seville do not possess, these being always somewhat preoccupied with the effect they produce. At Malaga I saw most beautiful heads, superb types, which would offer to an artist of talent a series of entirely new and valuable studies.

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

From our point of view it seems strange that women should be present at a spectacle where a man's life is imperilled at every moment; where blood flows in pools; where wretched, ripped-up horses stumble over their own entrails. One might easily imagine that such women must be bold-eyed vixens, violent in gesture; but it would be a mistake. Never did more Madonna-like faces, more velvety eyes, and more tender smiles bend over an infant Christ. The successive phases of the bull's death are attentively followed by pale and charming creatures whom an elegiac poet would be only too glad to have for Elviras; the merit of the strokes is discussed by such pretty lips that one could wish to hear them speak but of love. Because they look with dry eyes upon scenes of carnage which would cause our sensitive Parisian ladies to faint, it would be wrong to infer that they are cruel and lack tenderness; it does not prevent their being good, simple-hearted, and sympathetic; but habit is everything, and the bloody side of a bull-fight which most strikes strangers is what least occupies Spaniards, who pay attention to the skill with which blows are dealt and the cleverness shown by the toreros, who do not run such great risks as one might at first fancy.

It was yet but two o'clock, and the sun poured down a deluge of fire upon the side of the circus upon which we were seated. How we envied the fortunate ones who were enjoying the coolness of the shade cast by the boxes above. After having ridden ninety miles through the mountains, to remain a whole day under the African sun was a pretty fine thing for a poor critic who had, for once, paid for his seat and did not wish to resign it.

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

The people who occupied the shaded seats chaffed us incessantly. They sent water-sellers to prevent our catching fire; they begged us to light our cigars at the tip of our noses, and they suggested that we might have a little oil in order to complete the stew. We replied as well as we could, and when the shadow, moving with the day, gave up one of them to the rays of the sun, there broke out endless laughter and applause. Thanks to a few jars of water, several dozens of oranges, and a couple of fans constantly kept in motion, we avoided being burned up, and we were not quite cooked or struck with apoplexy when the band sat down in its gallery and the cavalry patrol began to clear the arena, which was full of muchachos and majos, who disappeared, I know not how, into the general throng, although, mathematically speaking, there was not room for another person; but under certain circumstances a crowd is wonderfully elastic.

An immense sigh of satisfaction arose from the fifteen thousand people, whose expectations were at last about to be fulfilled. The members of the ayuntamiento were saluted with frantic applause, and when they entered their box the orchestra began to play national airs, "I who am a Smuggler," and "Riego's March," which the whole company sang together with clapping of hands and stamping of feet.

We do not intend to describe here the bull-fight; we did so carefully during our stay in Madrid; we shall merely relate the chief events, the remarkable features of this fight during which the same combatants performed for three days running without rest, when twenty-four bulls and ninety-six horses were slain, although no accident happened to the men save the ripping up of a man's arm; a wound in no wise dangerous, which did not prevent his reappearing the following day in the arena.

At five o'clock sharp the gates of the arena were opened, and the company which was to perform marched in procession around the circus. At its head were the three picadores, Antonio Sanchez and José Trigo, both from Seville, and Francesco Briones from Puerto Réal, hand on hip, lance erect, as grave as Roman generals ascending in triumph to the Capitol. The saddles of their horses had the name of the owner of the circus marked with gilded nails. The capadores, or chulos, wearing their three-cornered hats and wrapped in their brilliant mantles, followed. Close behind them were the banderilleros in their

---

Figaro costume. At the end of the procession, alone and majestic, the two matadores, the swords, Montes de Chiclana and José Parra de Madrid. Montes had with him his faithful quadrille, a most important matter for the security of a bull-fight; for in these times of political dissensions it often happens that Christino toreros will not help Carlist toreros when they are in danger, and vice versa. The procession was closed by the significant team of mules intended to carry off the horses and bulls.

The fight was about to begin. The alguazil, in civilian dress, who was to carry to the attendant the keys of the toril, and who rode very unskillfully a spirited horse, prefaced the tragedy by an amusing farce. He first lost his hat and then his stirrups, his trousers came up to his knees in the most grotesque fashion; and the gate having been maliciously opened for the bull before he had time to withdraw from the arena, his terror made him still more ridiculous through the contortions which he indulged in on his horse. Nevertheless, he was not thrown, to the great disappointment of the rabble. The bull, dazzled by the torrent of light which flooded the arena, did not at first perceive him, and let him go without charging him. So it was in the midst of an immense Homeric, Olympic burst of laughter that the fight began; but soon silence fell, the bull having ripped up the first picador's horse and thrown the second.

We could look but at Montes, whose name is popular all over Spain, and whose prowess is sung in a thousand marvellous tales. Montes was born at Chiclana, near Cadiz. He is a man of forty to forty-three years of age, somewhat above the average height, serious-looking, of quiet mien, pale, olive complexion, with nothing noticeable about him save the mobility of his eyes, which in his impassible face alone seem endowed with life. He appears supple rather than robust, and owes his success more to his coolness, to his wonderful eye, and to his thorough knowledge of the art, than to his muscular strength. As soon as a bull has stepped into the arena, Montes knows whether it is short or long sighted, whether it is frank or cunning, whether it is light or heavy, whether it will close its eyes as it gores or whether it will keep them open. Thanks to these observations, which are as swift as thought, he is always ready to defend himself. However, as he carries cool rashness to extremes, he has during the course of his career

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

been gored more than once, for he bears a cicatrice on his cheek, and on more than one occasion he has been carried off dangerously wounded.

He wore that day a costume of apple-green silk embroidered with silver, exceedingly rich and elegant; for Montes is wealthy, and if he still takes part in bull-fights, it is from love of the art and the need of excitement, for his fortune amounts to more than fifty thousand douros, an enormous sum if one bears in mind the cost of the costumes which matadores have to wear, — a complete suit costing from fifteen hundred to two thousand francs, — and the incessant trips which they make from one city to another accompanied by their quadrilles.

Montes is not content, like other espadas, to simply slay the bull when the death signal has been given; he watches the whole arena, directs the combat, goes to the rescue of the imperilled picadores or chulos. More than one torero has owed his life to his intervention. A bull, which was not to be drawn away by the capas agitated before him, was goring the horse which he had overthrown, and was trying to gore the rider, sheltered by the body of his steed. Montes got hold of the fierce beast by the tail and swung it around two or three times to its intense disgust, amid the frantic applause of the whole company, and thus gave time to pick up the picador. Sometimes he plants himself right in front of the bull, his arms crossed, his eyes fixed upon him. The brute stops suddenly, daunted by the clear glance, sharp and cold as a sword-blade. Then break out indescribable shouts and howls and vociferations, stamping of feet and explosions of bravos. Everybody goes crazy, the thousands of spectators, drunk with brandy, sunshine, and blood, become absolutely hysterical; handkerchiefs are waved, hats thrown in the air, and Montes, the one calm individual in the multitude, enjoys silently his deep satisfaction, and bows slightly like a man capable of far greater deeds. We can understand that a man should risk his life every minute for such applause. It is not paying too dear for it. Oh! golden-voiced singers, oh! fairy-footed dancers, actors of all kinds, emperors, poets, who imagine you have excited enthusiasm, you have never heard Montes applauded.

Montes' fashion of slaying is remarkable for its accuracy and for the certainty and felicity of his stroke. In his case all thought of danger vanishes;

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

he is so cool, so thoroughly master of himself, he seems so certain of success that the fight appears to be but a pastime. Even the excitement itself is somewhat diminished; it is impossible to fear for his life; he will strike the bull when he pleases, where he pleases, and how he pleases. The chances of such a duel are too unequal. The least skilful matador sometimes produces a greater effect through the risks and chances which he takes. This no doubt may strike some as very refined barbarity, but dilettanti, or those who have seen bull-fights and have become excited over a bold, brave bull, will easily understand us. An episode which occurred on the last day of the fight will prove the truth of our assertion, and to what a degree the Spanish carry impartiality towards man and beast.

A superb black bull had just been let into the arena. From the abrupt way in which it emerged from the toril the connoisseurs formed the very highest opinion of its bravery. It united all the points of a fighting bull: its horns were long and sharp, the points well turned; its limbs, clean, fine, and muscular, promised great speed; its heavy dewlap and thin, strong flanks gave proof of mighty strength.

In the herd it was known as Napoleon, that being the only name which answered to its unquestioned superiority. Without the least hesitation it charged the picador posted near the gates, threw him down with his horse, which was killed on the spot, and charged the second who was no luckier, and whom there was scarcely time to pass over the fence, bruised and crushed by his fall. In less than fifteen minutes seven horses were lying on the sand.

The chulos waved their coloured capas, but from a distance, and did not go very far from the palisades, springing on the other side of them as soon as Napoleon even looked as if he would move in their direction. Montes himself appeared somewhat agitated, and once even he put his foot on the ledge of the fence ready to spring over in case of alarm and of too rapid pursuit, a thing which he had not done on the preceding days. The spectators' delight was expressed by noisy acclaims, and the most flattering compliments were showered upon the bull from all sides. A further proof of the animal's prowess carried enthusiasm to the highest degree of exasperation. A picador's understudy — for the two chief men were hors de combat — was waiting, lance in rest, the charge of the terrible Napoleon, which, heedless of the wound in the shoulder, caught the horse under the belly, with one jerk made him fall on his fore legs upon the edge of the fence, and with a second, raising his hind quarters, sent him with his master flying on the other side of the barrier in the flagged passageway which runs around the arena.

This feat was welcomed with thunders of applause. The bull was master of the arena, which he traversed like a conqueror, amusing himself for lack of adversaries in turning over and tossing the body of the horse which he had ripped up. The stock of victims was exhausted, there were no more horses left in the circus stable to give to the picadors; the banderilleros were astride of the fence, afraid to go down to worry with their darts that terrible gladiator, whose fury unquestionably did not need to be excited. The spectators, irritated at the wait, shouted for the banderillas, and to throw into the fire the alcalde because he did not give the order. At last, at a sign from the Governor of the city, a banderillero left the group and planted two darts in the neck of the maddened beast, fleeing as fast as he could, but not quite fast enough, for the horn touched his arm and ripped up his sleeve. Then, in spite of the howls and shouts of the people, the alcalde gave the death signal, and signed Montes to take his muleta and sword, in spite of all the rules of the bull-fight which insist that a bull shall have received at least four pairs of banderillas before it is given up to the sword of the matador.

Montes, instead of proceeding as usual to the centre of the ring, stood some twenty steps from the fence for safety in case of misfortune. He was very pale, and without indulging in any tricks and coquetries of courage, he unfolded his scarlet muleta and called upon the bull, which did not need to be asked twice. Montes performed three or four passes with the muleta, holding his sword horizontally at the height of the beast's eyes, which suddenly fell as if struck by lightning, and expired after a convulsive bound. The sword had entered his brow and struck the brain, a stroke which is forbidden by the laws of tauromachy; for the matador is bound to pass his sword between the horns of the animal and to strike it between the shoulders, which increases the danger for the man and gives a slight chance to his adversary.

When the stroke was understood, for it had been

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

---

delivered with the quickness of thought, a shout of indignation arose from all parts of the circus ; a storm of insults and hisses broke with incredible tumult and noise. "Butcher ! assassin ! brigand ! thief ! galley slave ! executioner !" were the mildest of the expressions used. "To Ceuta with Montes !" "Burn him alive !" "Set the dogs on him !" "Death to the alcalde !" sounded from all the seats. Never have I seen such fury, and I confess with a blush that I shared it. Presently shouts were insufficient, and the poor devil was assaulted with fans, hats, sticks, jars full of water, and pieces of the benches which the spectators tore up. There was still another bull to be slain, but its death passed unperceived in the midst of this horrible bacchanal, and it was José Parra the second espada, who slew it with a clever stroke. As for Montes, he was livid, green with rage. He bit his lips to the blood, although he attempted to appear very calm and leaned with affected grace upon the hilt of his sword, the ensanguined point of which he had wiped in the sand, against all rule. How slight is one's hold on popularity ! No one could have imagined the day before, and the day before that, that so consummate an artist, one so thoroughly master of his public as Montes, could be so rigorously punished for a breach of the rules, no doubt committed through imperious necessity in view of the extraordinary agility, vigour, and power of the animal. The fight over, he got into a calesa, followed by his quadrille, swearing that never again would he set foot in Malaga. I know not whether he kept his word and remembered longer the insults of the last day than the triumphs of the preceding two. I now think that the public of Malaga was unjust towards the great Montes de Chiclana, every one of whose strokes had been superb and who had given proof on dangerous occasions of cool heroism and admirable skill, so that the people, delighted, had presented him with all the bulls which he had slain, and had allowed him to cut off their ears as a mark of ownership, so that they could be claimed neither by the Hospital nor by the contractor.

Dazed, intoxicated, filled with violent emotions, we returned to our parador, hearing as we went along the streets nothing but praise for the bull and curses against Montes. That very evening, in spite of fatigue, I went to the theatre, wishing to pass without transition from the bloody realism of the circus to the intellectual emotion of the stage. The contrast was striking. In the one place a crowd and noise, in the other loneliness and silence. The theatre was almost deserted, and a few scattered spectators sat here and there upon the empty benches; and yet the play was "The Lovers of Teruel," a drama by Eugenio Hartzenbusch, one of the most remarkable works of the modern Spanish school, written in prose and in verse. As far as a stranger can judge of the style of a language which he can never thoroughly know, the verse of Hartzenbusch appears to me superior to his prose. His dialogue in prose seems to me imitated from the modern French melodramas and is marked by heaviness and pomp. With all its defects of "The Lovers of Teruel" is a literary work much superior to the adapted and misadapted translations of our boulevard plays which at present are met with in every theatre in Spain. A comic saynète followed the serious play. The saynètes resemble our vaudevilles, but the plot is less complex, and they often consist merely of a few detached scenes like the intermezzo of an Italian comedy.

The performance was closed by a national dance, performed by two couples of dancers in fairly satisfactory fashion. The Spanish dancers, although they have not the finish, the accuracy, the style of French dancers, are greatly superior, I think, in grace and charm. They look like women who dance, and not like dancers, which is a very different thing. Their method has no relation whatever to that of the French school. In the latter, immobility and uprightness of the bust are expressly recommended, and the body scarcely ever shares the motion of the legs; in Spain the feet rarely leave the ground; it is the body that dances, the back that curves, the hips that yield, the waist that is twisted with the suppleness of an almeh or an adder. In some of the poses the shoulders of the dancer almost touch the ground, the arms, limp and dead, are as flexible and soft as an untied scarf, the hands seem scarcely able to clap the ivory castanets with their golden tressed cord; and yet in another moment bounds like those of a young jaguar follow the voluptuous languor, and prove that the bodies, soft as silk, are provided with muscles of steel. The Moorish almehs still cling to this method. Their dance consists of harmoniously lascivious undulations of the torso, the hips, and the back, the arms being thrown back over the head.

Arab traditions have been preserved in the Spanish national steps, especially in Andalusia.

The Spanish male dancers, although mediocre, have a bold, cavalier, gallant air which I greatly prefer to the tasteless and equivocal graces of ours. They appear to think neither of themselves nor of the public; their every glance, their every smile is addressed to their partner, with whom they always seem to be passionately in love, and whom they are prepared to defend against all comers. They possess a sort of fierce grace and insolent pose which is quite peculiar to them. If they were to wipe off their rouge, they would make excellent banderilleros, and could spring from the stage into the arena.

The Malagueña, the Malaga national dance, is charmingly poetic. The cavalier first appears, his sombrero pulled down over his eyes, wrapped in his scarlet cloak like a hidalgo in search of adventures. The lady enters draped in her mantilla, fan in hand, with the airs of a woman who is going for a turn on the Alameda. The cavalier tries to see the face of the mysterious siren; the coquette handles her fan so well, opens and shuts it so exactly at the right time, turns it so promptly up to her pretty face, that the disappointed gallant withdraws somewhat and bethinks himself of another stratagem. He begins clinking his castanets under his cloak. At the sound the lady listens, smiles, her bosom heaves, she beats time with the tip of her little satin shoe ; in spite of herself she throws away her fan and her mantilla and appears in brilliant dancing-dress, sparkling with spangles and ornaments, a rose in her hair, a great tortoise-shell comb at the back of her head. The gallant throws off his mask and his cloak, and the two perform a dance delightfully novel.

As I came back by the seaside, which reflected on its burnished steel surface the pale orb of the moon, I thought of the striking contrast between the crowd at the circus and the solitude at the theatre, of the eagerness of the multitude for brutal facts and its indifference to the works of the intellect. As a poet, I again envied the gladiator ; I regretted to have given up action for reverie. The night before in the same theatre had been given a play by Lope de Vega, which had not attracted more people than the work of the young writer ; so both the genius of the past and the talent of the present age are not considered equal to one sword-stroke of Montes !

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

The other theatres in Spain are not better attended than that at Malaga, not even the del Principe at Madrid, where nevertheless there is a very great actor, Julian Romero, and an excellent actress, Matilda Diez. The old Spanish dramatic vein seems to have been exhausted forever, and yet never did a fuller stream flow in so broad a bed, never was there such prodigious, inexhaustible fertility. Our most facile writers of vaudevilles are yet a long way from Lope de Vega, who had no co-workers, and whose works are so numerous that the exact number is unknown and that there is scarcely a complete edition of them. Calderon de la Barca, apart from his unrivalled comedies de capa y espada (dramas of cloak and sword), wrote innumerable autos sacramentales, a sort of Catholic Mysteries, in which strange depth of thought and singularity of conception are joined to enchanting poetry and to the most flowery elegance. It would take folio catalogues to enumerate merely the titles of the works of Lope de Rueda, Montalban, Guevara, Quevedo, Tirso, Rojas, Moreto, Guillen de Castro, Diamante, and many others. It is impossible to realise how many plays were written for Spain during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries ; it would be as easy to count

MALAGA

the leaves in the forest and the sand on the seashore. Most of these plays are written in octosyllabic verse mingled with assonances, and printed in two columns on cheap quarto paper, with a coarse engraving by way of frontispiece. They form pamphlets of six or eight leaves. The booksellers' shops are full of them; thousands are seen suspended pell-mell amid the ballads and the versified legends sold at the open-air bookstalls. The epigram addressed to a too fertile Roman poet, who was burned after his death on a pyre formed of his own works, might without exaggeration be applied to most Spanish dramatists. They have a fertility of invention, a way of crowding in events and complicating the plot, which it is impossible to give any idea of. Spaniards invented the drama, long before Shakespeare; their theatre is Romanticist in the fullest sense of the word. Apart from some puerile exhibitions of erudition, their plays owe nothing either to the Greeks or the Latins, and, as Lope de Vega says in his "New Art of Writing Plays," "I lock up the rules with seven keys."

Spanish dramatists do not appear to have troubled much about depicting character, although in every scene one comes upon piquant and delicate observations.

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

Man is not studied philosophically, and one does not often meet in their dramas with those individual figures so frequent in the work of the great English dramatist, which are copied from life, which help on the action but indirectly, and whose sole purpose is to represent one side of the human soul, an original personality, or else to reflect the poet's thought. With the Spaniards the author rarely shows his personality except at the end of the drama, when he begs the spectator to pardon his faults.

The principal motive in Spanish plays is the point of honour, which is to the Spanish play what Fate is to the Greek tragedy. Its inflexible laws, its cruel consequences, easily give rise to dramatic scenes of the highest interest. El pundonor, a sort of chivalric religion, with its code of laws, its statutes, its refinement, is far superior to the ἡγάμεν, to the Fate of antiquity, whose blindly dealt strokes fall at haphazard upon both the guilty and the innocent. One often rebels, when reading the Greek dramatists, at the situation of the hero, who is equally criminal whether he acts or does not act. The Castilian point of honour is always perfectly logical and in agreement with itself. Besides, it is only the exaggeration of all human virtues carried to the highest degree of susceptibility ; the hero always preserves a noble, solemn attitude, even in the midst of his most horrible outbursts of anger and in his most atrocious vengeance. It is always in the name of loyalty, of conjugal faith, of respect for ancestors, of the integrity of his name, that he draws from its sheath his great sword with the iron shell-guard, even against those whom he loves with all his soul and whom an imperious necessity compels him to slay. The interest in most of the plays of the old Spanish drama, the touch of sympathetic interest so keenly felt by the spectators, who, under similar circumstances would have acted exactly as the characters in the play, springs from the struggle between passions and the point of honour. With so fruitful a motive, one so deeply rooted in the manners of the time, the prodigious fertility of the old dramatists of the Peninsula is easily understood. Another no less abundant source of interest lies in virtuous actions, in chivalrous devotion, in sublime renunciation, in unchanging fidelity, in superhuman passion, in ideal refinement, which resist the best-laid plots and the most complicated ambushes. In this case the poet seems to intend to exhibit to the spectators a complete model of human perfection. All the qualities he can think of he bestows upon his prince or his princess; he makes them more anxious to preserve their purity than is even the white ermine, which would rather die than stain its snowy fur.

A deep Catholic and feudal feeling breathes through all this drama, which is absolutely national in its origin, in its matter, and in its form. The division into three days adopted by Spanish authors is unquestionably the most reasonable and logical. The exposition, the knot, and the termination, — such is the natural distribution of every well understood dramatic action, and we should be wise to adopt it in place of the old division into five acts, two of which are so often useless, the second and the fourth. It should not, however, be supposed that the old Spanish plays were nothing if not sublime. The grotesque, that indispensable element of mediæval art, is introduced into it in the person of the gracioso, of the bobo (clown), who enlivens the serious situation or action by more or less risqué jokes and pleasantries, and produces by the side of the hero the same effect as those deformed dwarfs with variegated jackets, playing with greyhounds taller than themselves, which are represented by the side of the king or prince in the old portraits in the galleries.

MALAGA

Moratin, the author of the "Si de las Ninos," and "el Cofe," whose tomb is in the Père Lachaise cemetery in Paris, is the last representative of the Spanish dramatic art, as the old painter Goya, who died at Bordeaux in 1828, was the last descendant of the great Velasquez.

Nowadays Spanish theatres give little else than translations of French melodramas and vaudevilles. At Jaen, in the heart of Andalusia, they were playing "The Bell-ringer of Saint Paul's"; at Cadiz, within two steps of Africa, "The Street Boy of Paris." The saynètes, once so gay, so original, of such marked local savour, are now only imitations borrowed from the repertory of the Théâtres des Variétés. Leaving out Martinez de la Rosa and Antonio Gil y Zarate, who already belong to a less recent period, Spain counts, nevertheless, a number of young men of talent and promise; but popular attention in Spain as in France is drawn in another direction through the seriousness of events. Hartzenbusch, the author of "The Lovers of Teruel"; Castro y Orozo, the author of "Frey Luis de Léon, or the Age and the World"; Zorillo, whose drama, "El Rey y el Zapatero," was so successful; Breton de los Herreros, the Duke of Rivas, Larra, who killed himself for love ; Esproncedo, whose death has but recently been announced, and who put into his work a force and passionate energy sometimes worthy of his model, Byron, are — alas ! of the latter two we must say were — writers full of merit, ingenious, elegant, facile poets, who might be placed side by side with the old masters if they did not lack what we all lack, — certainty, a firm starting-point, a stock of ideas shared with the public. The point of honour and the heroism of the old plays is no longer understood or seems ridiculous, and modern beliefs are not yet sufficiently formulated for poets to express them. So we must not blame overmuch the crowd which in the meantime invades the circuses and seeks emotions where they are to be found. It is not the people's fault, after all, if the theatres are not more attractive ; it is so much the worse for the poets, if they let the gladiators conquer them.

On the whole it is better for the mind and the heart to see bold men slay a wild beast in the face of heaven than to hear an actor without talent singing an obscene vaudeville or chattering wretched literature behind smoky footlights.

UP to this time we had made acquaintance with two-wheeled galleys only ; we were now to learn something of the four-wheeled galley. One of these pleasant vehicles, filled already with a Spanish family, was about to start for Cordova. We completed the load. Imagine a fairly low cart provided with open-work side-straps, and having for flooring an esparto net in which are heaped up trunks and packages without much care for the projecting and re-entering angles. On top are thrown two or three mattresses, or, to speak more accurately, linen sacks in which have been inserted a few lumps of uncarded wool ; upon these mattresses, stretched transversely, the poor travellers, in an attitude — may we be forgiven the dreadful comparison ! — very like that of calves carried to market. Their feet are not bound, but their position is scarce improved. The cart, covered by a stout awning over hoops, is driven by a mayoral and drawn by four mules.

The family with which we were travelling was that of an engineer, fairly well instructed and speaking French easily. It was accompanied by a tall rascal of uncouth mien, who had formerly been a brigand in José Maria's band, and now was a mine inspector. He followed the galley on horseback, knife in belt, carbine on holster. The engineer seemed to think a great deal of him, and praised his probity as if his former profession inspired him with no uneasiness on the subject. It is true that when speaking of José Maria he repeatedly said of him that he was a worthy, honest man. This opinion, which would appear to us slightly paradoxical as applied to a highwayman, is shared in Andalusia by the most honourable people. Spain has remained African in this respect, and bandits are easily accepted as heroes,—a curious connection less strange than seems at first sight, especially in France; because where the imagination of the people is so highly impressionable, contempt for death, boldness, coolness, prompt and audacious decision, skill and strength, the sort of grandeur which attaches to a man in revolt against society,—are not all those qualities, which act so powerfully on minds little civilised, the very traits which form great characters; and are the people so very wrong to admire these energetic natures, although the use to which they turn them is worthy of condemnation?

The road along which we were travelling climbed up and down, in rather abrupt fashion, a district intersected by hills and narrow valleys, the bottom of which formed dry river-beds full of huge stones, which jolted us atrociously and drew sharp cries from the women and children. On the way we noticed some remarkably poetic and richly coloured sunset effects. The distant mountains turned purple and violet, with a golden haze of extraordinary warmth and intensity over all. The complete absence of vegetation gave to the landscape, composed solely of soil and sky, an appearance of grand nudity and fierce barrenness, the equivalent of which is nowhere else to be met with, and which painters have never succeeded in reproducing.

We halted for a few hours at nightfall in a little hamlet of three or four houses, to rest the mules and to take some nourishment. At about one in the morning we started again, and in spite of the extraordinary jolts and the children of the mining engineer, who rolled over us, and the way our heads were bumped against the sides, we were not long in going to sleep. When the sun awakened us, we were near Caratraca, an insignificant village which was not marked on the map and is known only for its sulphur springs, which are very efficacious in skin diseases; they attract to this lonesome place a suspicious-looking lot of people with whom it would be unhealthy to come in contact. These people gamble frightfully, and although it was yet very early, the cards and the gold-pieces were already flying over the table. It was hideous to see these earthy, greenish-faced patients made more hideous still by rapacity, and the convulsive fingers slowly put out to seize their prey.

The houses of Caratraca, like those of every Andalusian village, are whitewashed, which with the bright-coloured tiles and the leaves of the vines and shrubs which surround them, gives them an air of comfort and ease very different from the opinion which most people in Europe have of Spanish filthiness, an opinion which is widespread but which can have arisen only through some wretched hamlets in Castile, of which we have more than the equivalent in Brittany and Sologne. In the courtyard my glances were attracted by coarse frescoes representing in most primitive fashion scenes from bull-fights. Around the paintings were stanzas in honour of Paquirro Montes and his quadrille.

After we had had our siesta, the mules were harnessed to the galley, each one of us resumed his place upon the mattress, the escopetero climbed on his little mountain-horse, the mayoral collected pebbles to throw at his animals, and we started again. The country we were traversing was wild without being picturesque: bare, rough hills, stony torrent-beds like cicatrices cut in the ground by the devastating winter rains, woods of olive trees, the pale foliage of which, covered with dust, suggested no idea of verdure or coolness; here and there on the gullied banks of chalk or tufa ravines, a clump of fennel turned white by the heat; on the dusty road the tracks of serpents and vipers; over all a sky as hot as an oven, not a breath of air, not a puff of wind,—the gray sand thrown up by the hoofs of the mules fell dead. A sun fit to heat iron white-hot beat down upon the awning of our galley, inside of which we were ripening like melons under glass. From time to time we alighted and walked for some distance, keeping within the shadow of the horse or the cart, and climbed back with unstiffened legs into our place, stumbling over the children and the mother, for we could only reach our corner by crawling on all-fours under the low arch of the galley hoops.

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

By dint of crossing ravines and quagmires and cutting across fields to shorten the way, we managed to lose the road. Our mayoral, in hopes of coming across it, went on as if he were quite sure of where he was going; for cosarios and guides will never confess that they are lost until the very last moment, when they have taken you fifteen or eighteen miles off the road. It is true that nothing was easier than to lose this astounding road, scarcely beaten, cut every moment by ravines. We were in the midst of great fields with scattered, stunted olive trees with twisted trunks, without any trace of human dwelling or of living beings. Since morning we had met but one half-naked muchacho driving before him, in a cloud of dust, a dozen black porkers. Night fell. To complete our troubles, there was no moon, and we had nothing but the faint light of the stars to go by. Every few minutes the mayoral got down from his seat and felt the ground with his hands to ascertain if there was not a road, or a wheel-track which might lead us back to the road ; but his investigations were useless, and much against his will he was compelled to tell us that he had lost his way and did not know where he was. He could not understand it ; he had travelled twenty times along the road and could have gone to Cordova with his eyes shut.

However, after having wandered at haphazard for two or three hours, we perceived far in the distance a light shining through branches like a glow-worm. We immediately made it our polar star and drove in its direction as straight as possible, running the risk of upsetting at every step. Sometimes a hollow in the ground concealed it from our sight, and then all nature seemed a blank ; then it reappeared, and our hopes rose again. At last we got close enough to a farm to make out the window, the heaven whence shone our star in the shape of a brass lamp. Ox-wagons and agricultural implements scattered here and there wholly reassured us, for we might have fallen upon some cut-throat place, some smugglers' den. The dogs, having scented us, were barking loudly, so that very soon the whole farm was up. Peasants came out gun in hand, to learn the cause of the night alarm, and having ascertained that we were

It was their supper time. An old woman, wrinkled, tanned, and almost mummified, was preparing in a red earthen jar a huge gaspacho. Five or six tall greyhounds, thin loined, broad chested, with splendid heads, worthy of being in a royal pack, followed the movements of the old woman with the most sustained attention and the most melancholy and admiring air imaginable. But that delightful meal was not intended for them; in Andalusia it is men, not dogs, to whom is served a soup of bread crusts soaked in water. Cats deprived of ears and tail,—for in Spain these ornamental superfluities are cut off,—and who looked like Japanese monsters, also watched, but from a greater distance, the appetising preparations.

We were given for guide a young fellow who was thoroughly acquainted with the roads, and who took us without difficulty to Ecija, which we reached about ten in the morning.

The approach to Ecija is rather picturesque. It is reached by a bridge, at one end of which stands a monumental arcaded gate. The bridge spans the river, which is the Granada Genil, obstructed by the ruins of antique arches and mill-weirs. At the other end one enters a square planted with trees and adorned with two monuments in poor taste. The one is a gilt statue of the Virgin placed upon a pillar of which the hollowed out base forms a sort of chapel, ornamented with pots of artificial flowers, ex votos, wreaths of elder-pith, and all the gewgaws of Southern devotion. The other is a giant Saint Christopher, also in gilt metal, leaning upon a palm tree, a stick proportionate to his height, and carrying on his shoulder with the most prodigious contraction of muscles and with efforts which would suffice to lift a house, an exceedingly small Child Jesus, delightful in its delicacy and daintiness. This colossus, attributed to the Florentine sculptor Torregiani, who broke Michael Angelo's nose with a blow of his fist, is perched upon a column of the Salomonic order (that is the name given here to twisted pillars) in pale rose granite, the spiral of which ends half-way up in extravagant volutes and foliage.

I like very much statues thus placed; they are more effective and can be seen from a greater distance and more advantageously. Ordinary pedestals are usually massive and heavy, and thus diminish the lightness of the figures they upbear.

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

Ecija, although lying outside of the beaten track of tourists and consequently little known, is nevertheless a most interesting town, very original and characteristic. The steeples, which form the most striking feature of its silhouette, are neither Byzantine nor Gothic nor Renaissance; they are Chinese, or rather, Japanese. They might be mistaken for some miao consecrated to Confucius, Buddha, or Fo, for they are covered all over with porcelain or china tiles most brilliantly coloured, ribbed with green, and white varnished tiles laid checker-board wise, which have the most peculiar appearance possible. The rest of the architecture is no less fantastic, and the love of the grotesque is carried to its utmost limit. It consists of a maze of gildings, incrustations, breccias and coloured marbles used as if they were stuffs; wreaths of flowers, love-knots, puffy angels all painted and rouged, of inconceivable richness and in sublimely bad taste.

The Calle de los Caballeros, where live the nobility and on which are situated the finest hotels, is marvellous in this respect. It is hard to believe that one is in a real street, between houses inhabited by actual beings. There is not a straight line in it; its balconies, its iron-work, its friezes, — everything is twisted and turned, and blooms out into flowers, volutes, and foliage. There is not a single inch which is not hatched, festooned, gilded, embroidered, or painted. All that rococo can produce of most rocky disorder, all that French taste, even at the worst times, has always known how to avoid, is here most luxuriant. This Pompadour-Dutch-Chinese style amuses and startles one in Andalusia. Most of the houses are whitewashed of a dazzling whiteness which stands out against the dark blue of the sky, and their flat roofs and their small windows and look-outs made us think of Africa,—an idea confirmed by the heat of ninety degrees, which is the average temperature of the place in cool summers. Ecija is called the Andalusian Frying Pan, and never did any place better deserve its name. Situated on low ground it is surrounded by sandy hills which keep off the wind and reflect the rays of the sun. Man lives there in a state of constant stew. Nevertheless, we bravely traversed it in every direction while waiting for breakfast. The Plaza Major is very striking, with its pillared houses, its rose windows, its arcades and projecting balconies. Our inn was rather comfortable, and we were served a most decent meal, which we enjoyed with pardonable sensuality after our many privations. A long sleep in a well closed, well darkened, well watered room fully rested us, and when at about three o'clock we climbed back into the galley, we looked quite serene and resigned.

CORDOVA

The road from Ecija to Carlotta, where we were to sleep, runs through an uninteresting district, barren and dusty; at least, so it appeared to us at that season, and it has left no particular mark on our remembrance. From time to time a few clumps of olive trees or of green oaks showed here and there, and the aloes spread their bluish foliage, which always produces a striking effect.

Carlotta, where we stopped for the night, is a hamlet of no importance. The inn is an old convent which was first used as a barracks, as is almost always the case in times of revolution, military life being that which most easily adapts itself to buildings constructed for monkish life. Long arcaded corridors formed an open gallery upon the four sides of a court. In the centre of one of these yawned the black mouth of a huge well, very deep, which promised us the delightful treat of clear, cold water. As I bent over the edge, I saw that the interior was hung with plants of the loveliest green, which had grown in the interstices of the stones ; and it was in wells, indeed, that one had to look to find verdure and coolness, for the heat was comparable to that in the neighbourhood of a great fire. The temperature of a hot-house in which tropical plants are raised can alone give any idea of it ; the very air was burning, and the puffs of wind seemed to carry fire with them.

We left Carlotta at about three o'clock in the afternoon, and in the evening we halted at a wretched gipsy hut, the roof of which consisted merely of branches of trees, placed like coarse thatch upon cross poles. After having drunk a few glasses of water, I lay quietly down in front of the door, and while looking into the deep azure of the sky I was not long in sinking into a deep sleep, just as if I were lying on the softest of beds. Never did a lovelier and more serene night robe the earth in its blue velvet mantle. At about midnight the galley started again, and at dawn we were within half a league of Cordova.

The description of our halts and our days' journeys might lead to the belief that Cordova is a long way from Malaga, and that we had travelled over an enormous extent of road, during the four days and a half, yet the distance traversed is only about twenty Spanish leagues, or about ninety miles; but the carriage was heavily laden, the road abominable, and there were no relays of mules ready. Add to this the intolerable heat, which would have killed both men and beasts if we had ventured out while the sun was high. We look back pleasantly upon that slow and toilsome journey. Swift travelling is devoid of charm. You are carried along as in a whirlwind and you have no time to see anything. If you are to get to the end of your trip at once, you might just as well remain at home. What I enjoy is the travelling itself and not the arrival.

Cordova is entered from the Ecija side by a bridge across the Guadalquivir which is fairly wide at this place. Close by are to be seen the ruins of an Arab aqueduct. The end of the bridge is defended by a great square, crenellated tower flanked by casemates of more recent construction. The city gates were not yet open. A multitude of ox-teams, enormous, majestic, adorned with tiaras of esparto; of mules and white donkeys laden with cut straw; of peasants with sugar-loaf hats, wearing cloaks of brown wool, falling before and behind like a priest's cape, and which are put on by passing the head through a hole cut in the centre of the piece of stuff, were waiting for the opening of the gates with the phlegm and patience usual to Spaniards, who appear never to be in a hurry. A similar crowd at the gates of Paris would have made a horrible noise, and have indulged in insults and invectives. In this case no sound was heard but the trembling of a copper bell on a mule's collar and the silvery tinkle of a leading ass changing its position or resting its head upon the neck of a long-eared brother.

We profited by the halt to examine leisurely the situation of Cordova. A fine gate, looking like a triumphal arch of the Ionic order and in such good taste that it might have been thought to be Roman, formed the majestic entrance to the city of the Caliphs, though I should have preferred one of those beautiful horse-shoe Moorish arches such as one sees in Granada. A mosque-cathedral rises above the walls and the roofs of the city, resembling a citadel rather than a temple, with its high walls broken by the Arab battlements and the heavy Gothic dome resting upon its eastern platform. These walls, it must be confessed, are washed with an abominable yellow colour. Without being of those who are particularly fond of mouldy, leprous-looking buildings, we entertain a peculiar horror for this hideous squash-colour, which so delights priests, vestries, and chapters in all countries, for they never fail to use it upon the marvellous cathedrals which are intrusted to them. Buildings must be painted and always have been, even in the most artistic days, only the shade and the kind of wash should be selected with extreme care.

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

At last the gates were opened, and we had first the exciting pleasure of being searched pretty minutely by the custom-house officers, after which we were left free to repair with our trunks to the nearest inn.

Cordova has more of an African look than any other Andalusian city : its streets, or rather, lanes, — the disorderly paving of which resembles the dry bed of a torrent, — strewn with the short straw which falls from the loads carried by the asses, in no wise recall the manners and habits of Europeans. You walk between endless chalky walls with a few grated and barred windows ; you meet a beggar with repulsive face, a devotee in her black hood, or a major riding swiftly by upon a white-harnessed, brown horse which strikes sparks from the stones as it goes. If the Moors were to return, they would not have to alter much before settling down. The idea that one may have of Cordova, that it has traceried spires and houses with Gothic windows, is entirely incorrect. The universal use of whitewash gives a uniform tone to all the buildings, filling the cavities, concealing the tracery and preventing one guessing at their age. Thanks to whitewash, a wall built a century ago cannot be distinguished from one finished yesterday. Cordova, of yore the wonder of Arab civilisation, is now only a mass of little white houses divided into blocks by narrow lanes which would not give passage to two mules abreast; above rise a few Indian fig-trees, with metallic-looking foliage, and feathery palms.

Life seems to have abandoned this great body, so animated in the time of the Moors. It is now but a whitened and glistening skeleton. Cordova, however, has preserved its mosque, a unique monument, entirely novel, even to travellers who have already had an opportunity of admiring the marvels of Arab architecture at Granada or Seville.

In spite of its Moorish appearance, Cordova is a good Christian city, and is placed under the special protection of the Archangel Raphael. From the balcony of our parador we saw the curious monument in honour of this divine patron. The archangel at the top of his column, sword in hand, wings outspread, glistening in gold, seems to be eternally watching over the city intrusted to his keeping. The column, of gray granite with a Corinthian capital in gilded bronze, rests on a small tower or lantern in rose granite, the lower portion of which is formed of rock-work, upon which are grouped a horse, a palm tree, a lion, and a most fantastic marine monster. Four allegorical statues complete the ornamentation. In the base is enclosed the coffin of Bishop Pascal, who was famous for his piety and his devotion to the holy archangel. The following inscription is cut on a scroll: "I swear to you by Jesus Christ that I am the Angel Raphael, to whom God has given this post for the guarding of this city."

You may ask, how it is known that the Archangel Raphael happened to be the patron of the old city of Abd-er-Rhaman and not some one else. You will find the answer in a ballad, printed by permission at Cordova at Don Raphael Garcia Rodriguez', in Liberty Street. This precious document has at its head a woodcut representing the archangel with outspread wings, a halo around his head, his travelling-stick and his fish in his hand, majestically placed between two superb pots of hyacinths and peonies, with an inscription which reads thus: "Truthful Account and curious Legend of his Lordship Saint Raphael, Archangel, Advocate of the Pest, and Guardian of the City of Cordova." The document goes on to state how the blessed archangel appeared to Don Andreas Roelas, a gentleman and priest of Cordova, and addressed to him in his room a speech of which the first sentence is that which has been engraved upon the column. The speech, which the legends have preserved, lasted for more than an hour and a half, the priest and archangel being seated opposite each other, each on a chair. The apparition took place May 7 in the year of grace 1578, and it is in memory of it that this monument has been erected.

The esplanade, surrounded by an iron-work fence, stretches around the monument, and enables one to observe it from every side. Statues thus placed gain elegance and beauty which greatly please me and which wonderfully conceal the bareness of a terrace or a public square, or of too large a court.

The exterior of the cathedral had not attracted us greatly, and we feared to be bitterly disappointed. Victor Hugo's lines, —

“ . . . Cordova, besides its old houses,
Has its mosque, in which the eye roams amid marvels,” seemed to us in advance too flattering; but we were soon convinced that they were entirely justified. It was the Caliph Abd-er-Rhaman who first laid the foundation of the Cordova mosque towards the end of the eighth century. The work proceeded with such speed that the building was completed at the beginning of the ninth century. Twenty-one years were sufficient to erect that gigantic building. When we reflect that a thousand years ago a work so admirable and of such colossal proportions was carried out in so short a time and by a people who have since fallen into the deepest state of barbarism, one is amazed and refuses to believe in the so-called doctrine of progress which is current to-day; one is even tempted to adopt the contrary opinion when visiting countries formerly occupied by civilisations which have disappeared. For my part, I have always greatly regretted that the Moors did not remain masters of Spain, which has certainly incurred loss only through their expulsion. Under their rule, if we are to believe the popular exaggerations so seriously collected by historians, Cordova had two hundred and fifty thousand houses, eighty thousand palaces, and nine hundred baths, while twelve thousand villages formed its suburbs; now it has not even forty thousand inhabitants and appears almost deserted.

Abd-er-Rhaman wished to make the Mosque of Cordova the object of pilgrimages, the chief temple of Islam next to that in which rests the body of the Prophet. I have not yet seen the Kasbah at Mecca, but I question whether it equals in splendour and extent the Spanish mosque. In the latter was preserved at one time one of the original copies of the Koran, and a still more precious relic, — a bone of the arm of Mahomet. The common people even now claim that the Sultan of Constantinople still pays tribute to the King of Spain in order that mass may not be said in that portion specially consecrated to the Prophet. This chapel is ironically called by devotees the Zancarron, a term of contempt which means “The bare bone.”

The mosque of Cordova has seven gates, which have nothing monumental about them; for the very principle of the building is opposed to it and does not allow of the majestic portal imperiously required by the regular plan of the Gothic cathedrals. Nothing, therefore, on the exterior prepares one for the wondrous spectacle of the interior. We shall pass through the Patio de los Naranjos, a vast and splendid court planted with huge orange-trees, contemporaries of the Moorish kings, surrounded by long galleries with marble-flagged arcades, on one of the sides of which rises a spire in mediocre taste, an unskilful imitation of the Giralda, as we later ascertained in Seville. Under the pavement of this great court there exists, it is said, a vast cistern. In the time of the Ommiyads one passed from the Patio de los Naranjos straight into the mosque itself, for the hideous wall which cuts off the view on this side was built later.

The best idea that we can give of that strange building is to say that it resembles a huge esplanade closed in and surrounded by groves of pillars. This esplanade is four hundred and twenty feet wide and four hundred and forty feet long; the columns number eight hundred and sixty. There is but half of the original mosque left, it is said.

The impression made on one on entering this ancient sanctuary of Islam is indefinable and has no resemblance to the emotions usually produced by architecture. One seems to walk through a ceiled forest rather than through a building. Whichever way one turns, the glance wanders down lines of pillars which cross and stretch as far as the eye can reach like a marble vegetation which has spontaneously sprung from the soil. The mysterious twilight which reigns in this stone forest adds to the illusion. There are nineteen naves in the direction of the breadth, thirty-six in the other, but the opening of the cross arcades is narrower. Each nave is formed of two ranks of superimposed arches, some of which cross and interlace like ribbons, producing the quaintest effects. The pillars, which are cut out of single blocks of stone, are not more than ten to twelve feet in height to their capital, which is in a strong and delicate Arab-Corinthian style recalling the African palm rather than the Greek acanthus. The pillars are of precious marbles, porphyry, jasper, green and violet breccia and other precious materials; there are even some antique pillars among them, which come, it is said, from the ruins of a former temple of Janus. So the worship of three different religions has been celebrated on this site. Of these three religions, one has disappeared forever in the abyss of the past with the civilisation which it represented ; the other has been driven out of Europe, where it has now but a foothold, to the very confines of Oriental barbarism ; the third, after having reached its apogee, now mined by the spirit of investigation, is growing weaker day by day even in those countries where it formerly reigned as absolute sovereign ; and perhaps Abd-er-Rhaman's old mosque may last long enough to see a fourth creed installed under its arches, celebrating with another ritual and with other hymns the new god, — or rather the new prophet, for God never changes.

In the days of the Caliphs, eight hundred silver lamps filled with aromatic oil lighted up these long naves, made the porphyry and polished jasper of the columns flash again, studded with spangles of light the gilded stars of the ceiling, and showed through the shadows the crystal mosaics and the verses of the Koran interlaced in arabesques and flowers. Among these lamps were the bells of Santiago de Compostello, taken by the Moors. Overset and suspended from the ceiling by silver chains, they illumined the temple of Allah and his prophet, much surprised at having turned into Moslem lamps after having been Catholic bells. In those days the glance could roam freely along the vast colonnades and discover from one end of the temple the orange trees in bloom and the upspringing fountains of the court in a flood of light which was all the more dazzling by contrast with the twilight of the interior. Unfortunately, this magnificent prospect is now obstructed by the Catholic church, a huge building, set heavily in the very centre of the Arab mosque. Retables, chapels, and sacristies encumber and destroy the general symmetry. This parasitic church, a monstrous stone mushroom, an architectural wart which has grown on the back of the Arab building, was constructed from the designs of Hernan Ruiz, and is not without merit in itself; anywhere else it would be admired; but it is forever to be regretted that it should have been placed where it stands. It was built, in spite of the resistance of the municipal authorities, by the chapter, in consequence of a decree obtained surreptitiously from the Emperor Charles V, who had not seen the mosque. Visiting it a few years later, he remarked: "If I had known the facts, I should never have allowed the old work to be touched. You have put what may be seen anywhere in place of what is to be seen nowhere else." This well deserved reproach shamed the chapter, but the evil was done.

In the choir there is a vast piece of carved wood-work in massive mahogany, which represents subjects drawn from the Old Testament, and which is the work of Pedro Cornejo, who spent ten years of his life in this vast labour, as may be seen on the tomb of the poor artist, who lies asleep a short distance from his masterpiece. Speaking of tombs, we noticed a curious one set into the wall, in shape like a trunk and closed with three padlocks.

Until the middle of the eighteenth century the old cedar and larch ceiling of Abd-er-Rahman had been preserved, with its sunken panels, its lozenges and Oriental beauty; it has been replaced by vaults and semi-cupolas in mediocre taste. The old pavement has been replaced by a tiled pavement, which has raised the level of the floor and conceals the base of the pillars, and thus makes more striking the general defect of the building, which is too low for its size.

All these profanations do not prevent the Mosque of Cordova from being even now one of the most marvellous buildings in the world, and as if to make us feel more bitterly the mutilation which the rest has undergone, a portion, called the Mirâbb, has been preserved as if by a miracle with scrupulous integrity.

The carved and wooden ceiling, with its media naranja studded with stars, its traceried windows with their gratings that give passage to a soft light, the gallery with its trefoil, the coloured-glass mosaics, the lines of the Koran in gilded, crystal letters which wind in and out through the most complicated and graceful ornaments and arabesques, — form a work of fairy richness, beauty, and elegance, the like of which is to be found only in the “Thousand and One Nights,” and which need not envy their art. Never were lines more judiciously chosen, colours better combined. Even the Gothic artists, in their most delicate fancy, in their most precious goldsmith-work exhibit something sickly, emaciated, and thin which recalls the barbarism and the infancy of art. On the contrary, the architecture of the Mirâbb exhibits a civilisation which has attained to its culminating point; beyond there can only be decadence; nothing is lacking of proportion, harmony, richness, and grace.

From this chapel one enters a small and highly ornamented sanctuary, the ceiling of which is composed of a single block of marble cut into a shell shape and carved with infinite delicacy. This was probably the holy of holies, the dread and sacred place where the presence of God was more manifest than elsewhere. Another chapel, the Chapel of the Moorish Kings, where the Caliphs said their prayers apart from the multitude of believers, also presents some interesting and delightful details, but it has not been as fortunate as the Mirâhb, and its colours have vanished under an ignoble layer of whitewash.

The sacristies overflow with treasures: dazzling monstrances set with precious stones, silver reliquaries of enormous weight and wondrous work, as large as small cathedrals, candelabra, golden crucifixes, gold-embroidered copes, — of Asiatic and more than regal luxury.

As we were about to leave, the beadle who guided us led us mysteriously to an obscure corner and exhibited to us as the greatest curiosity the crucifix which is said to have been carved with his fingernails by a Christian prisoner upon a porphyry column at the foot of which he was chained. By way of proving the truth of his story, he showed us the statue of the poor captive standing a little way off. Without being more of an unbeliever than is proper in matters of legend, I could not help thinking that in those days either men had very hard finger nails or porphyry was very soft. Nor is this the only crucifix; there is a second one upon another column but much less well done. The beadle also showed us a huge ivory tusk suspended from the ceiling of a cupola by iron chains, like the hunting-horn of some Nimrod of a vanished world. The tusk belonged, it is said, to one of the elephants employed in hauling the material during the building of the mosque.

On leaving the cathedral, we stopped for a few moments before a pretty Gothic portal which forms the façade of the Foundling Hospital. Anywhere else it would be admired, but the imposing neighbourhood in which it is placed eclipses it.

Having visited the cathedral, there was nothing to occupy us in Cordova, a stay in which was not very pleasant. The only amusement of a stranger is to bathe in the Guadalquivir or to be shaved in one of the numerous barber-shops around the mosque, — an operation performed most dexterously, with the help of a huge razor, by a small individual perched upon the back of the great oaken armchair in which you are seated.

The heat was unbearable, for it was increased by fire. The harvest was just over, and it is the custom in Andalusia to burn the stubble when the sheaves have been brought in, so that the ashes may fertilise the ground. The country was blazing for ten or twelve miles around, and the wind passing over this ocean of flame brought us puffs of air as hot as that which escapes from a furnace. We were like scorpions whom children surround with a circle of shavings to which they set fire, and which are obliged to make a desperate sortie or to commit suicide by stinging themselves. We chose the former method.

The galley by which we had come took us back by the same road to Ecija, where we asked for a calesa to go to Seville. The driver, having seen the two of us together, thought that we were too tall, stout, and heavy to take, and raised a series of objections: our trunks, he said, were so very heavy that it would take four men to raise them, and would break down his carriage. We at once removed this objection by picking up and putting the slandered trunks upon the back of the calesa. The rascal, having no further objections to offer, at last made up his mind to start.

Flat or slightly undulating ground planted with olive trees, the gray colour of which is made paler by the dusty, sandy steeps on which shows from time to time blackish verdure, — these were the only things we saw for many a mile.

At Luisiana all the inhabitants were stretched out at their doors, snoring in the starlight. Our carriage forced the lines of sleepers to rise and press against the walls, grumbling and lavishing on us all the riches of the Andalusian vocabulary. We stopped at an ill-looking posada, with more guns and muskets than cooking-utensils. Dogs of monstrous size followed every movement of ours with attention, and seemed to wait but a sign to tear us to pieces. The quiet voracity with which we despatched our tomato omelet seemed to surprise our hostess extremely; she appeared to consider the repast superfluous and to regret the food which would not profit us. However, in spite of the sinister appearance of the place we did not have our throats cut, and the people were clement enough to allow us to continue on our way.

The ground became more and more sandy, and the wheels sank up to the axles in the soft soil. Then we understood why our driver was so worried by our weight. To relieve the horse we got down, and about midnight, after having travelled along a road which ascended the steep slopes of a mountain, we reached Carmona, where we were to sleep. Lime-kilns cast over the rocky slope long, reddish reflections which produced wonderfully strong, picturesque effects of light and shade.

Beyond Carmona the cacti and aloes which had forsaken us reappeared fiercer and more bristling than ever. The landscape was less bare, less red, and more diversified; the heat was also somewhat less intense. We soon reached Alcala de los Panaderos, famous for its excellent bread, as its name indicates, and its novillos-fights (young bulls), to which the aficionados of Seville repair during the intermission of bull-fights in that city. The town is admirably situated at the bottom of a small valley, through which meanders a river. It is sheltered by a hill on which rise the ruins of an old Moorish palace. We were near Seville, and before long the Giralda showed against the sky, first its traceried lantern, and then its square tower. A few hours later we were passing under the Carmona Gate, the arch of which framed in a background of dusty light, in which moved through a mist of golden vapour galleys, mules, asses, and ox-waggons, some going and some coming. The massive arches of a superb aqueduct of Roman aspect showed on the left of the road; on the other side rows of houses, set closer and closer together. We were in Seville.

SEVILLE

A SPANISH proverb very often quoted says that he who has not seen Seville has not seen a marvel. We humbly confess that this proverb would appear to us more accurate if it applied to Toledo or Granada than to Seville, in which we found nothing particularly marvellous save the cathedral.

The city is situated on the banks of the Guadalquivir, in a broad plain whence it derives its name of Hispalis, which means in Carthaginian "flat ground," if Arias Montano and Samuel Bochart are to be believed. It is a large, wide-spreading city, quite modern, bright, gay, animated, and which no doubt must strike Spaniards as charming. No greater contrast to Cordova could be found. Cordova is, as already said, an ossuary of houses, a catacomb under the open sky, over which loneliness scatters its whitish dust. The stray inhabitants who show at the corners of the streets look like ghosts that have mistaken the time. Seville, on the contrary, has all the excitement and bustle of life; a rumour hovers over it at every moment of the day; it scarcely takes time to enjoy its siesta; it is not troubled by yesterday, still less by to-morrow, — it is wholly given up to the present. Memory and hope constitute the happiness of unfortunate places: but Seville is not unfortunate; it enjoys itself, whilst Cordova, its sister, seems in silence and solitude to dream of Abd-er-Rahman and of the Great Captain, of all its vanished splendour — lights gleaming in the night of the past, of which it has naught left but the ashes.

To the great disappointment of travellers and antiquarians, whitewash reigns supreme in Seville. Houses are whitewashed three or four times a year, which makes them look clean and well kept, but which prevents one tracing the remains of Arab and Gothic sculptures which formerly adorned them. Nothing is more monotonous than the network of streets which exhibit but two shades, the indigo blue of the heavens and the chalk white of the walls, upon which fall the blue shadows of the neighbouring buildings; for in these hot countries the shadows are blue instead of being gray, so that objects seem to be lighted on the one side by moonlight and on the other by sunlight.

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

However, the lack of dark shades results in much liveliness and gaiety. Gates closed by gratings allow you to catch glimpses of courts adorned with columns, mosaic pavements, fountains, pots of flowers, shrubs, and paintings. As for the exterior architecture, it is in no wise remarkable. The buildings are rarely more than two stories high, and scarcely a dozen façades artistically interesting are to be found. The pavement is composed of small pebbles as in all Spanish towns, but by way of pavement there is laid a band of fairly wide, flat stones on which the crowd walks in Indian file. Ladies are always given the right of way, with that exquisite politeness which is natural in Spain, even to the lowest class.

The Seville women justify their reputation for beauty. They are almost all alike, as is the case with pure races of characteristic type. They have large eyes furnished with long, brown lashes which have an effect of black and white unknown in France. When a woman or maid passes near you, she lowers her eyelids, then suddenly opens them and flashes straight at you a glance so dazzling that you cannot sustain it, gives one turn to her eyes and again lowers her eyelashes. We have no expression to describe this fashion of using the eyes; ojear is lacking in our vocabulary. These sudden and bright glances, which almost embarrass strangers, have no particular meaning and are cast indifferently upon anything. A young Andalusian will look with that passionate glance at a passing cart, a dog trying to catch its tail, children playing at bull-fighting. The eyes of Northern people are dull and dead in comparison; the sun has never left these reflections in them. Teeth, the incisors of which are very sharp and which are as bright as those of a young Newfoundland dog, give to the smile of the women of Seville a touch of Arab and of strangeness which is very striking. The brow is high, rounded, and polished, the nose delicate and somewhat aquiline, the lips richly coloured. Unfortunately, the chin sometimes ends with too sharp a curve the oval outline so admirably begun. The only imperfection which the most fastidious artist could find in the Seville ladies is that their shoulders and arms are somewhat thin; the joints, the small hands and feet leave nothing to be desired. Without any poetic exaggeration, one would easily find among the Seville women feet which a child could hold in its hand. The Andalusians are very proud of this, and are very careful of the kind of shoes they wear. They are usually of satin, and barely cover the toes. Unfortunately, Seville ladies are Spanish and remain Spanish only as far as their feet and their heads are concerned, as far as the shoe and mantilla go. Coloured dresses cut in French fashion begin to prevail. Men are dressed up like tailor's patterns. Sometimes, however, they wear short, white-duck jackets and white trousers with a red sash and an Andalusian hat; but that is rare and the costume itself is not very picturesque.

It is on the Alameda del Duque, where one takes the air between the acts at the play — for the theatre is close by — and especially at the Paseo de Cristina, that it is delightful to see, between seven and eight, parade and coquette the pretty Sevillians in small groups of three or four accompanied by their actual or prospective gallants. There is something light and springing about their gait, so that they prance rather than walk. The swiftness with which they open and close their fans, the brilliancy of their glance, the assurance of their gait, the undulating suppleness of their figure, give them a most distinctive air. There may be more perfectly and more regularly beautiful women in England, France, or Italy, but certainly there are none prettier or more piquant. These Sevillians pos-ness in a high degree what the Spaniards call sal. It is difficult to give an idea of it in conversation: it is composed of nonchalance and vivacity, of quick replies and childish ways, of a gracefulness as piquant as it is savoury, which need not accompany beauty, but which is often preferred to it. So in Spain they say to a woman, "How salt (salada) you are!" and no compliment is greater than that.

The Paseo de Cristina is a superb promenade upon the banks of the Guadalquivir, with a Salon paved with large slabs, surrounded by a white-marble bench with an iron back, shaded by Oriental plane-trees, and with a maze, a Chinese pavilion, and all sorts of Northern trees, ash, cypress, poplar, willow, which excite the admiration of the Andalusians, just as aloes and palms would excite that of Parisians.

At the approaches to the Cristina there are bits of cord steeped in sulphur and rolled around posts, which offer a light always ready for smokers, so that one is freed from the nuisance of the boys who carry coals and pursue you, shouting out, "Fuego!" which makes the Prado at Madrid so unbearable.

Pleasant as is this promenade, nevertheless I prefer the river bank itself, which offers an ever-varied and animated spectacle. In the centre of the river where the water is deepest are anchored the trading barks and schooners with their airy rigging, the lines of which show so clearly against the light background of the sky. The swift boats cross and recross the river in every direction, sometimes bearing a company of young men and young women who go down stream playing on the guitar and singing couplets, which are scattered around by the breeze, and which the people on shore applaud. The Torre del Oro, a sort of octagonal tower with three stories, crenellated after the Moorish fashion, its base bathed by the Guadalquivir near the landing-place, and which springs up into the blue sky from amidst a forest of masts and rigging, bounds admirably the prospect on this side. This tower, which is, so the learned insist, of Roman construction, was formerly connected with the Alcazar by walls which have been taken down for the construction of the Paseo de Cristina, and it held at the time of the Moors one of the chains which barred the river, the other one of which was fastened opposite to counterforts of masonry. Its name comes, it is said, from the fact that the gold brought from America by galleons was stored in it.

Every evening we used to go to walk there and watch the sun setting behind the Triana suburb, situated on the other side of the river. A noble palm-tree spread its disc of leaves as if to salute the setting sun. I have always greatly loved palm trees, and I can never see one without being carried off into a poetic and patriarchal world, into the midst of foreign scenes of the East, of the splendours of the Bible.

A bridge of boats connects the two banks and unites the suburbs to the city. You have to pass over it to visit, near Santiponce, the remains of Italica, the native place of Silius Italicus, the poet, and of the emperors Trajan, Hadrian, and Theodosius. There still exists a ruined amphitheatre, the outline of which is quite plain. The dens in which the wild beasts were kept, and the dressing-rooms of the gladiators are easily recognised, as well as the corridors and the seats. It is built of cement mixed with stones. The stone revetments have probably been carried off for more modern buildings, for Italica has long served as a quarry for Seville. A few rooms have been cleared out and serve as a shelter during the heat of the day for troops of blue porkers, which bolt with a grunt between the visitors' legs, and constitute to-day the only population of the old Roman city. The most complete and interesting remains of all that vanished splendour is a mosaic of great size which has been surrounded with walls, and which represents the Muses and Nereids. When water has been poured over it to revive the colours, they show very brilliantly, although cupidity has led to some of the most precious portions being carried away. There have also been found in the débris some fragments of statues in fairly good style, and there is no doubt that intelligent search would result in important discoveries. Italica lies about four or five miles from Seville, and it is an excursion which one can easily make in the course of an afternoon by taking a carriage, unless one is a fanatical archæologist and insists on examining, one after another, all the old stones suspected of bearing inscriptions.

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

The Trajan Gate is also claimed to be Roman and is named after the emperor. It is of monumental aspect, of the Doric order, with columns in pairs adorned with the royal arms and surmounted by pyramids. It has its own alcalde, and is used as a prison for knights. The gates del Carbon and del Aciete are well worth looking at. On the Xeres Gate is the following inscription : “ Hercules built me ; Julius Cæsar encircled me with walls and lofty towers ; the Saintly King won me with Garci Perez de Vargas.”

Seville is surrounded by a girdle of crenellated walls, flanked at intervals by great towers, several of which have fallen into ruins, and moats now wholly filled up. The walls, which would be useless against modern artillery, have, thanks to their dentelated Arab crenellations, quite a picturesque effect. Julius Cæsar is said to have built them, as he is said to have built every wall and camp that exists.

The Cristina, the Guadalquivir, the Alameda del Duque, Italica, and the Moorish Alcazar are no doubt very interesting things, but the real marvel of Seville is its cathedral, which is indeed a surprising building, even after the cathedrals of Burgos and Toledo, and the Cordova Mosque. The chapter which ordered it to be built, summed up its intention in these words : “ Let us erect a monument which shall lead posterity to think that we were mad.” That was a broad and well drawn up programme. So, having full powers, the artists performed prodigies, and the canons, in order to hasten the completion of the building, gave up their whole income, keeping only what was absolutely necessary to sustain life. O thrice holy canons, may you sleep gently under your slabs in the shadow of your beloved cathedral, while your souls are enjoying themselves in paradise in stalls probably less beautifully carved than those which stand in your choir.

The mightiest and most amazing Hindoo pagodas do not approach the Seville Cathedral. It is a hollow mountain, a valley overset. Notre-Dame in Paris could stand in the centre of the nave, which is of dizzy height; the pillars, as large as towers, though they seem so slender that they make you shudder, spring from the ground or hang from the ceiling like the stalactites of a giant grotto. The four lateral naves, although less lofty, could hold churches with their steeples. The retable and the high altar, with its staircases, its superimposed stories, its lines of statues rising one above another, are in themselves a vast edifice, ascending almost as high as the vaulting. The Paschal candle, which is as tall as a vessel's mast, weighs two hundred and fifty pounds; the bronze candlestick which supports it is like the column of the Place Vendôme. It is copied from the candlestick of the Temple at Jerusalem as it is represented on the bassi-relievi of the Arch of Titus.

SEVILLE

Everything is on the same grand scale. Every year there are consumed in the cathedral twenty thousand pounds of wax and an equal quantity of oil; the sacramental wine amounts to the terrifying quantity of eighteen thousand seven hundred and fifty pints. It is true that every day there are five hundred masses said at eighty altars. The catafalque which is used during Holy Week, and which is called "The Monument," is nearly one hundred feet high. The organs, of gigantic size, look like the basalt columns of Fingal's Cave, and yet the storms and thunders which escape from their pipes, which are the size of siege guns, sound like melodious murmurs, warblings of birds, and song of seraphs under those colossal arches. There are eighty-three painted windows after cartoons by Michael Angelo, Raphael, Dürer, Peregrino, Teobaldi and Lucas Cambiaso; the oldest and finest are the work of Arnold of Flanders, a famous painter on glass; the latest, which bear the date of 1819, show how greatly the art has degenerated since the glories of the sixteenth century, the climacteric epoch of the world, when the plant called Man bore its finest flowers and its most savoury fruits. The choir, in the Gothic style, is ornamented with turrets, spires, tra-

To attempt to describe the riches of the cathedral one after another would be madness; it would take a year to visit it thoroughly, and then one would not have seen everything; whole volumes would not be sufficient for the choir. Stone, wood, and silver sculptures by Juan de Arfe, Juan Millan, Montanes, de Roldan; paintings by Murillo, Zurbaran, Campaña, de Roelas, Luis de Villegas, Herrera the elder and Herrera the younger, Juan Valdes, and Goya litter the chapels, sacristies, and chapter-houses. You feel crushed by the splendour, drunk with masterpieces; you know not which way to look; the desire and yet the impossibility of seeing everything gives you a feverish vertigo; you wish not to forget anything, and every moment a name escapes you, a lineament becomes dimmed, one painting takes the place of another. You appeal desperately to your memory, you order your eyes not to waste a glance; the least rest, the time given to meals and to sleep, seem thefts, for imperious necessity drags you on. You have to go, —the fire is already lighted under the boiler of the steamer, the water hisses and boils, the funnels belch out their black smoke, —to-morrow you will leave all these marvels, never again, no doubt, to see them.

As I cannot speak of everything, I shall be satisfied with mentioning the "Saint Anthony of Padua" by Murillo, which adorns the Baptistery chapel. Never has the power of painting been carried farther. The saint in ecstasy is kneeling in the centre of his cell, the main details of which are rendered with that vigorous realism characteristic of the Spanish manner; through the half-open door is seen one of the long, white, arcaded cloisters so favourable to meditation. The upper portion of the painting, full of a pale, transparent, vaporous light, holds groups of ideally beautiful angels. Drawn by the force of prayer, the Child Jesus descends from cloud to cloud, and is about to rest on the arms of the holy personage, whose head, bathed in radiant effluvia, is thrown back in a spasm of celestial delight. We place this divine painting above that of "Saint Elizabeth of Hungary," which is to be seen in the Madrid Academy, above the "Moses," above all the Virgins and Children of the master, however beautiful and exquisite they may be. He who has not seen the "Saint Anthony of Padua" does not know the highest work of the Seville painter. It is like those who fancy they know Rubens and have never seen the Antwerp "Magdalen."

All styles of architecture are found in the cathedral of Seville, the severe Gothic, the Renaissance, the style called by the Spaniards plateresque, or silver-work, and which is marked by an incredible wealth of ornaments and arabesques, the rococo, the Greek, the Roman, — none are lacking, for every age has built a chapel or a retable in the taste which was its own, and the building is not yet entirely finished. Several of the statues which stand in the niches of the portals, representing patriarchs, apostles, saints, and archangels, are in terra cotta merely, and placed there provisionally. In the direction of the Court de los Naranjos, on the top of the unfinished portal, rises the iron crane, a symbol that the building is not yet finished and will be continued later. A similar crane stands also on top of Beauvais Cathedral; but when will the day come that the weight of a stone slowly hauled up through the air by workmen, will make its pulleys, rusted for centuries past, creak again. Never, perhaps; for the upward flow of enthusiasm has stopped, and the sap which caused this bloom of cathedrals to emerge from the soil no longer rises through the trunk and the branches. Profound faith had written the first strophes of all these poems in stone and granite; reason, which doubts, has not dared to finish them. The architects of the Middle Ages were religious Titans who heaped Pelion upon Ossa, not to overthrow the God of Thunders, but to admire from a nearer point the gentle face of the Virgin Mother smiling upon the Child Jesus. In our days, when everything is sacrificed to coarse and stupid comfort, one no longer understands these sublime upspringings of the soul towards the Infinite, which expressed themselves in steeples, in spires, in finials, in arches, which upraised to heaven their arms of stone joined over the heads of the prostrate people like giant hands folded in supplication. All these treasures, buried without bringing in anything, make economists shrug their shoulders with pity ; even the people begin to calculate the worth of the gold of the cup ; the people who of yore dared not raise their eyes to the white sun of the Host, now reflect that bits of crystal might perfectly well replace the diamonds and gems on the monstrance. The churches are scarce frequented save by travellers, beggars, and hideous old women. Spain is no longer Catholic.

The Giralda, which serves as a campanile to the cathedral and rises high above all the spires of the city, is an old Moorish tower built by an Arab architect named Djâbir or Gever, the inventor of algebra, to which he gave his name. It is very effective and very original. The rose-coloured brick and the white stone of which it is built impart to it an air of brightness and youth which contrasts with the date of the building, which goes back to the year 1000 (the Giralda was, as a matter of fact, built from 1184 to 1196), a very respectable age, at which a tower may indeed permit itself to be ruined and no longer fresh. The Giralda, as it stands to-day, is three hundred and fifty feet in height and fifty feet broad on each face. The wall is smooth up to a certain height, where begin stories of Moorish windows with balconies, trefoils, and slender columns of white marble framed in great panels of lozenge-shaped bricks. The tower formerly ended in a roof of varnished tiles of different colours, surmounted by a bar of iron adorned with four balls of gilt metal of prodigious size. This upper portion was destroyed in 1568 by the architect Francisco Ruiz, who sent one hundred feet higher into the pure light of heaven the tower of the Moor Gever, so that its bronze statue might look over the Sierras and talk familiarly with the angels who pass by. To build a steeple on top of a tower was to conform in every point with the intentions of the admirable chapter whom we have mentioned as willing to pass for mad in the eyes of posterity. The work of Francisco Ruiz consists of three stories, the first of which is pierced by windows in the embrasures of which are hung the bells; the second, surrounded by a traceried balustrade, bears on each face of the cornice the words, "Turris fortissima nomen Domini"; the third is a sort of cupola or lantern on which turns a giant figure of Faith in gilded bronze, holding a palm in one hand, a standard in the other, which serves as a vane and explains the name Giralda given to the tower. The statue is by

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

Bartolomé Morel. It is seen from a very long distance, and when it shines through the blue in the rays of the sun, it really looks like a seraph floating in the air.

The Giralda is ascended by a series of slopes without steps, so easy and so gentle that two men on horseback could easily ride abreast to the summit, whence one enjoys a wondrous panorama. Seville lies at one's feet, sparkling white, with its steeples and towers which in vain try to rise as high as the rose-brick girdle of the Giralda. Farther off stretches the plain, through which gleams the Guadalquivir; Santiponce, Algaba, and other villages are visible; in the farthest distance shows the chain of the Sierra Morena with its outline clear cut in spite of the distance, so great is the transparency of the atmosphere in this wonderful country. On the other side rise the Sierras de Gíbalbin, Zara, and Moron, coloured with the richest tints of lapis lazuli and amethyst. A marvellous prospect, filled with light, flooded with sunshine, and of dazzling splendour.

A great number of shafts of pillars cut down to the size of stone posts and connected by chains — save a few spaces left free for traffic — surround the cathedral. Some of these columns are antique, and come either from the ruins of Italica or the remains of the old mosque on the site of which the present church was built, and of which nothing is left but the Giralda, a few trees, and one or two arches, one of which serves as a gateway to the Court of Orange Trees (de los Naranjos).

The Lonja (Exchange), a great square building, perfectly regular, built by the heavy, dull Herrera, the architect of boredom, — to whom we are indebted for the Escorial, the gloomiest building in the world, — isolated on all sides and showing four identical façades, is situated between the cathedral and the Alcazar. There are preserved the American archives, the letters of Christopher Columbus, Pizarro, and Fernando Cortez.

The Alcazar, or old palace of the Moorish kings, though very beautiful and deserving of its reputation, has nothing striking when one has already seen the Alhambra. It has the same slender columns of white marble with gilded and painted capitals, the horseshoe arches, the panels filled with arabesques interlaced with verses of the Koran, doors of cedar and larch, cupolas hung with stalactites, fountains embroidered with carvings of which no description can express the infinite detail and minute delicacy. The Hall of the Ambassadors, whose magnificent doors remain in their entirety, is perhaps finer and richer than that at Granada. Unfortunately, the idea came to some one to turn to account the spaces between the slender pillars which bear up the ceiling to hang up a series of portraits of the kings of Spain from the most distant days to the present. Nothing can be more ridiculous.

The so-called baths of Maria Padilla, the morganatic wife of King Don Pedro the Cruel, who lived in the Alcazar, are still as they were in the time of the Arabs. The Hall of Vapour Baths has not undergone the slightest alteration. Charles V has left in the Alcazar, as he did in the Alhambra at Granada, much too numerous traces of his passage. The Alcazar contains gardens laid out in the old French taste.

To be done with architecture, let us pay a visit to the famous Hospital de la Caridad, founded by the famous Juan de Mañara, who is not a fabulous personage, as might be supposed. The Caridad contains most beautiful Murillos: "Moses striking the Rock," the "Miracle of the Loaves," which are vast compositions admirably wrought; "Saint John the Divine," carrying a dead man and supported by an angel, which is a masterpiece of colour and light and shade. Here is also the painting by Juan Valdes known as "The Two Bodies," a strange and terrible picture by the side of which Young's gloomiest conceptions are joyful pleasantries.

The bull-fight arena was closed, to our great regret, for dilettanti maintain that the Seville bull-fights are the most brilliant in Spain. Our hopes being dashed, there was nothing left but to go to Cadiz by steamer.

THE paddles, aided by the current, carried us rapidly towards Cadiz. Seville was already sinking in the distance astern, but by a splendid optical illusion, as the roofs of the city seemed to sink in the ground and to mingle with the straight lines of the distance, the cathedral grew and assumed enormous proportions; then first I grasped its enormous size. The highest steeples did not rise above the nave. As for the Giralda, the distance cast over its rose brickwork tints of amethyst and aventurine. The statue of Faith shone on top of its summit like a golden bee on top of tall grass. A turn in the river soon concealed the city from us.

The banks of the Guadalquivir, at least on the way to the sea, do not have the delightful aspect which poets and travellers attribute to them. I know not where they have seen the woods of orange trees and pomegranates with which they perfume their romances; in reality one sees but low, sandy, yellow

CADIZ—GIBRALTAR

banks, and turbid yellow water, the earthy colour of which cannot possibly be due to rain, which is very scarce in this country. I had already remarked this muddiness of the water in the Tagus. It may be due to the great quantity of dust which the wind carries into it and to the friable character of the soil the river traverses. The intense blue of the sky also has something to do with it, causing the tones of the water, always less brilliant, to appear somewhat dirty. The sea alone can rival such a sky in transparency and blueness. The river became broader and broader, the banks lower and flatter, and the general appearance of the landscape recalled closely the Scheldt between Antwerp and Ostend. This recollection of Flanders in the heart of Andalusia is the quainter because of the Moorish name of the Guadalquivir, but the recollection came so naturally to my mind that the resemblance must have been very real, for I can swear that I was not thinking much either of the Scheldt or of my trip to Flanders some six or seven years ago. There was very little traffic on the river, and as much as we could see of the country beyond the banks appeared uncultivated and deserted. It is true that we were then in the dog days, a season

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

during which Spain is not much else than a great heap of ashes without vegetation or greenness. The only living beings were herons and storks, one leg tucked up, the other half-plunged in the water, waiting for the passage of a fish, in such complete immobility that they might have been mistaken for wooden decoys stuck on sticks. Boats with lateen sails ascended and descended the river with the same wind; a phenomenon which I have never thoroughly understood, although it has been explained to me several times. Several of these vessels carried a third small sail of triangular shape placed in the vacant space between the two divergent points of the great sails. This rig is a very picturesque one.

It was pitch-dark when we reached Cadiz. The lights of the vessels anchored in the roads of the city, and the stars in the heavens studded the lapping waves with millions of gold, silver and fiery sparkles. In the calmer spaces the reflection of the lights traced, as it lengthened along the sea, long fiery columns of magical effect. The huge mass of the ramparts loomed grimly through the dark shadows.

As you will readily imagine, we rose with the day. To enter a strange city by night is one of the things which most irritates a traveller's curiosity. The next morning the city appears to you suddenly, in its entirety, just like a stage-setting when the curtain rises.

CADIZ—GIBRALTAR

Neither painters nor writers possess a choice of colours bright enough and luminous enough to render the dazzling impression which Cadiz made upon us on that glorious morning. Two principal tints struck the glance, blue and white; the blue was the sky, repeated in the sea, the white was the city. Nothing more radiant, more sparkling, of a luminosity more diffused and more intense at one and the same time, can be imagined.

The houses in Cadiz are much higher than in the other Spanish cities. This is due to the configuration of the ground, the city being built upon a narrow islet joined to the main land by a slender neck of land, and also to the desire of the inhabitants to have a view of the sea. Almost all the terraces have at one corner a turret or a belvedere, sometimes covered with a small cupola. These aerial look-outs adorn with innumerable irregularities the sky line of the city, producing the most picturesque effect. Everything is whitewashed, and the whitened façades are further brightened by long vermilion lines which separate the houses and mark off the stories. The balconies, which project considerably, are enclosed in a sort of glass cage adorned with red curtains and filled with flowers. Some of the cross streets end in nothingness, and seem to vanish into heaven. These glimpses of sky are charming in their unexpectedness. Aside from this gay, living, and luminous aspect, there is nothing remarkable in Cadiz. Its cathedral, a huge sixteenth-century building, although lacking neither nobility nor beauty, is in no wise remarkable, after the prodigies of Burgos, Toledo, Cordova, and Seville. It is something like the cathedrals of Jaen, of Granada, and Malaga, of classical architecture with more slender and delicate proportions, such as the Renaissance artists loved.

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

Cadiz is enclosed in a narrow girdle of ramparts, and a second girdle of reefs and rocks protects it from assaults and storms. On the glacis of the ramparts, provided at intervals with stone sentry-boxes, one can walk right around the city, one gate of which alone opens towards the main land, and one can see in the offing and in the roads, sweeping in or out in graceful curves, crossing, tacking, and veering like albatrosses, boats, feluccas, and fishing-boats, which in the distance look like the pinion feathers of a dove carried off by a mad wind. The prospect is most animated, lively, and charming.

On the breakwater near the Custom-house Gate, the bustle is unparalleled. The motley crowd, comprising representatives of every part of the world, constantly surges around the columns surmounted by statues which adorn the quay. Every variety of the human race is to be found there, from the fair-haired, white-skinned Englishman to the woolly-haired, bronzed African, passing through the intermediate shades of coffee-coloured, copper, and golden yellow. In the roads, somewhat farther away, lie the three-masters and frigates which every morning, to the beat of the drum, hoist the ensigns of their respective nations. The merchant vessels and steamers whose funnels belch forth bi-coloured vapour, come nearer the quay on account of their less tonnage, and form a foreground to this great naval composition.

The appearance of Cadiz from the sea is charming. When one sees it sparkling white between the azure of the sea and the azure of the sky, it looks like a great crown of silver filigree; the cathedral dome, painted yellow, resembles a golden tiara placed in the centre; the pots of flowers, the volutes and the turrets which

top the houses, vary the sky line infinitely. Byron has admirably reproduced the appearance of Cadiz in one line, —

“ Fair Cadiz, rising o’er the dark blue sea.”

Nevertheless, pleasant as Cadiz is, the thought that one is shut up within the ramparts, and closed in by the sea within its narrow bounds, inspires you with a desire to leave it. One fine morning my companion and I remembered that we had a letter of introduction from one of our Granada friends to his father, a rich wine-merchant at Xeres. The letter began in the following terms: “Open your heart, your house, and your cellar to the two gentlemen herewith.” We climbed on board a steamer, on the cabin wall of which was stuck a poster, announcing for that evening a bull-fight, with comic interludes, at Puerto de Santa Maria.

Xeres, like all small Andalusian towns, is white-washed from top to toe, and possesses nothing remarkable in the way of buildings save its bodegas or wine-cellars, huge places with tiled roofs and long, white, windowless walls. The person to whom we were recommended was absent, but the letter was effective and we were immediately taken to the cellars. Never did a more splendid sight strike a toper's eyes. We walked between walls of barrels four and five rows high. We had to taste of every kind, or at least, of the principal kinds — and there were a great number of principal kinds ; we went down the whole scale, from the eighty-year-old Xeres, dark, thick, tasting like muscat and having the strange colour of Béziers green wine, down to dry sherry, the colour of pale straw, with a flinty bouquet and rather like sauterne. Between these two extreme points there is a whole register of intermediate wines of the colour of gold, burnt topaz, or orange skin, and extremely varied in taste ; only, they are all more or less mixed with alcohol, especially those intended for the English market, for they would not be considered strong enough without.

The steamer "Ocean" was lying in the roads, kept back by the bad weather for some days past. We went on board with a feeling of deep satisfaction, for in consequence of the fights which had occurred at Valencia and the disturbances which had followed, Cadiz was somewhat in a state of siege. The sea was still rather rough, although the weather was splendid. The air was so clear that we could distinctly perceive the African coast, Cape Spartel, and the bay at the end of which stands Tangier, which we regretted being unable to visit. So that chain of mountains like clouds, and differing from them only by its immobility, was Africa, the land of wonders, of which the Romans said, "Quid novi fert Africa?" the oldest of continents, the cradle of Oriental civilisation, the birth-place of Islam, the black world where the shadows, gone from the sky, are to be found on faces alone; the mysterious laboratory, where nature, in seeking to produce man, first transforms a monkey into a negro. To see it and pass it by was a refinement of the torture of Tantalus.

Opposite Tarifa, a town whose chalky walls rise upon a steep hill behind an island of the same name, Europe and Africa draw near each other as if they would exchange a kiss of amity. The strait is so narrow that the two continents are seen at once. The prospect was marvellously magnificent. On the left Europe, on the right Africa, with their rocky coasts which distance clothed in tints of pale-lilac and rose, like shades of changing silk; before us the boundless horizon ever widening; above us a turquoise sky; beneath us a sapphire sea, so transparent that we could see the hull of our vessel, as well as the keels of the ships that passed near us, and which seemed to be flying through air rather than floating on water. We were bathed in brilliant light, and the only sombre tint within sixty miles was that of the long plume of dense smoke which we left behind us. A steamer is unquestionably a Northern invention. Its ever-burning fire, its boiler, its funnels which will at last blacken heaven with their soot, harmonise wondrously well with the moisture and vapours of the North; in the splendour of the South it is like a stain. Nature was happy. Great seabirds, as white as snow, skimmed the water; tunnies, dolphins, fishes of all kinds, shining, gleaming, sparkling, leapt and flashed amid the waves. Sail followed sail, white and swelling like the full breasts of a nereid showing above the waters. The shores were bathed in fantastic colours; folds, gullies, scarps caught the sunbeams in a way that produced the most amazing and unexpected effects, and offered an ever-changing prospect. At about four o'clock we were in sight of Gibraltar.

Gibraltar is absolutely amazing. One knows neither where one is nor what one sees. Imagine a huge rock, or rather a mountain, fifteen hundred feet high, which abruptly springs from the sea from ground so low and flat that it is scarcely perceived. Nothing presages it; there is no apparent reason for it; it forms part of no chain. It is a monstrous monolith thrown from heaven, or possibly a piece of a fractured planet which fell there in the course of an astral battle, a fragment of a broken world. Who placed it there? God and Eternity alone know. What adds still more to the effect of this strange rock is its shape. It looks like a huge granite sphinx of gigantic size, such as might have been carved by a Titan sculptor, and by the side of which the flat-nosed monsters of Karnak and Giseh look like mice by an elephant. The outstretched paws form what is called Europa Point. The head, somewhat flattened, is turned towards Africa, which it seems to gaze upon with deep, dreamy attention.

The town lies at its foot, almost imperceptible, lost in the mass. The three-deckers at anchor in the bay look like German toys, like miniature models of ships such as are sold in seaports; the barques like flies drowning in milk; even the fortifications do not show. And yet it is dug out, mined, warren'd in every direction; it is full of cannons and howitzers and mortars;

CADIZ—GIBRALTAR

it is replete with munitions of war; it is the very luxury and coquetry of the impregnable; but it shows to the eye merely as a few imperceptible lines mingling with the wrinkles of the rock, a few holes through which the guns show furtively their bronze muzzles. In the Middle Ages Gibraltar would have bristled with donjons, towers, and crenellated ramparts; instead of being at the foot, the fortress would have escalated the mountain and have been placed like an eyrie upon the topmost crest. The modern batteries are on the sea level of the strait, which is so narrow at this point that they render the passage almost impossible. Gibraltar was called by the Arabs Gibraltâh, that is, the Mount of Entrance. Never was a name better deserved. Its name in antiquity was Calpe. Abyla, now the Monkey Mountain, is on the African side close to Ceuta, a Spanish possession which is to the Peninsula what Brest and Toulon are to France, and where the worst of the galley slaves are sent. We could perfectly discern the shape of its escarpments and its crest, capped with clouds, in spite of the serenity of the rest of the heavens.

Like Cadiz, Gibraltar, situated upon a peninsula at the entrance to a bay, is connected with the mainland by a narrow tongue of land called the Neutral Ground, on which are the Custom-house lines. The first Spanish possession on that side is San Roque. Algeciras is exactly opposite Gibraltar.

---

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

---

The appearance of the town produces the quaintest effect. At one step you go more than five hundred leagues, rather more than Jack the Giant Killer with his famous boots. A moment since you were in Andalusia; now you are in England.

We took a turn upon a beautiful promenade planted with Northern trees and flowers and full of sentries and guns, where you can see carriages and riders exactly as in Hyde Park; all that is wanting is the statue of Wellington as Achilles. Happily the English have been unable to soil the sea or darken the heavens. This promenade is outside the city, near Europa Point, towards that side of the mountain inhabited by monkeys. It is the only point on our continent where these amiable quadrumana live and multiply in a wild state. As the wind changes, they pass from one side of the mountain to the other and thus act as barometers. It is forbidden, under very severe penalties, to kill them. I did not see any myself, but the temperature of the place is hot enough for the most warmth-loving monkeys to develop there without the need of stoves and furnaces. Abyla, on the African coast, possesses, if we are to believe its modern name, a similar population.

The next day we left this artillery park and centre of smuggling, and were sailing towards Malaga, which we already knew, but which we enjoyed seeing again with its tall, white, slender lighthouse, its harbour full of ships, and its continuous bustle. Seen from the sea, the cathedral appears larger than the city, and the ruins of the old Arab fortifications produce a most romantic effect upon the rocky slopes.

The next day we were at sea again, and as we had lost some time, the captain resolved to pass by Almeria and push on at once to Cartagena. We coasted Spain closely enough never to lose sight of its shores. The African coast, in consequence of the broadening of the Mediterranean basin, had long since vanished from the horizon. On the one hand, therefore, we beheld long stretches of bluish cliff with curious scarps and perpendicular fissures, spotted here and there with white dots that were villages, watchtowers, and custom-houses; on the other the open sea, sometimes shimmering and covered with lace-work by the current or the wind, sometimes a dead and dull azure, or else transparent as crystal, or again sparkling like a dancer's bodice, or an opaque, oily gray like mercury or molten lead, — an inconceivable variety of tones and aspects which would drive to despair painter and poet. A procession of red, white, and cream-coloured sails, of vessels of all sizes and of every flag, enlivened the scene and deprived it of the melancholy of infinite solitude.

---

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

Cartagena, called Cartagena de Levante in order to distinguish it from the African Cartagena, is at the foot of a bay, a sort of rocky funnel in which vessels are thoroughly sheltered from every wind. The sky line is not very picturesque. The most distinctive features impressed on our minds are two windmills standing out against the light background of the sky.

The aspect of Cartagena is entirely different from that of Malaga. As Malaga is bright, gay, animated, so is Cartagena dismal within its girdle of bare, sterile rocks, as dry as those Egyptian hills on the slopes of which the Pharaohs dug their royal tombs. The whitewash has disappeared, the walls have resumed their sombre tint, the windows are grated with complicated iron-work, and the houses, more repellent, have that prison look which is characteristic of Castilian manors; nevertheless, we are bound to say that we saw at these well-grated windows only lovely faces and angelic features.

From Cartagena we went to Alicante, which, in consequence of a line in Victor Hugo's "Orientales," —

"Alicante mingles minarets and steeples, —"

I had imagined possessed an infinitely picturesque sky line. Now Alicante, to-day at least, would find it difficult to mingle steeples with minarets, a mingling which I acknowledge to be very desirable and picturesque; first because it has no minarets, and second because the only steeple which it possesses consists of a very low and not very apparent tower. What does mark Alicante is a huge rock which rises in the centre of the town, which is topped by a fortress and flanked by a watch-house hung in the boldest fashion over the abyss. The City Hall, or to give it local colour, the Casa Consistorial, is a charming building in the best taste. The Alameda, flagged throughout with stone, is shaded by two or three lines of trees which have a fair number of leaves for Spanish trees the roots of which are not sunk in a well. The houses rise higher and have more of a European look.

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

From Alicante to Valencia, the shore cliffs continued to exhibit strange shapes and unexpected aspects. We were shown at the summit of a mountain a square cut which seemed to be the work of man. On the following morning we cast anchor before Grao, the name given to the port and suburb of Valencia, which is a mile and a half distant from the sea. The swell was fairly high, and we reached the landing-place pretty wet. There we took a tartana. The name tartana is usually applied to a vessel; the Valencian tartana is a carriage body covered with oil-cloth and placed on a couple of wheels without any springs. This vehicle appeared to us effeminately luxurious by comparison with the galleys.

Valencia, as far as picturesqueness goes, does not come up to the idea romances and chronicles give one of it. It is a great, flat, scattered town, irregular in plan and deprived of the advantages which the irregularity of buildings gives to old towns built upon steep ground. Valencia is situated in a plain called Huerta, in the centre of gardens and fields in which constant irrigation keeps up a verdure very rare in Spain. The climate is so mild that palms and orange trees grow in the open ground side by side with Northern plants.

CADIZ—GIBRALTAR

The Guadalquivir, spanned by five handsome stone bridges and bordered by a superb promenade, sweeps by the town almost under the ramparts. The numerous drains made upon its waters for the sake of irrigation make its five bridges merely luxurious ornaments for three-fourths of the year. The Gate of the Cid, through which one goes to the Guadalquivir Promenade, is flanked by great and rather striking crenellated towers.

The streets of Valencia are narrow, bordered by houses of cheerless aspect, on some of which may be made out some rough, mutilated coats of arms, fragments of chipped sculptures, clawless chimeras, noseless women, armless knights. A Renaissance window, lost in a hideous wall of recent masonry, draws from afar the artist's eyes and makes him sigh with regret; but these few remains have to be sought for in dark corners and in back yards; they do not prevent Valencia from having a very modern look. The cathedral, of hybrid architecture, in spite of its apse with a gallery of Romanesque arches, is in no wise interesting to a traveller after the marvels of Burgos, Toledo, and Seville. A few richly sculptured retables, a painting by Sebastian del Piombo, another by Spagnoletto, in his softer manner, when he tried to imitate Corregio, are the only notable things. The other churches, though enormous and rich, are built and decorated in that strange style of rocaille ornamentation which we have already described several times. On beholding these various extravagances one can only regret that so much talent and cleverness should have been so absolutely wasted. The Lonja de Seda, the Exchange, on the market-place is a charming Gothic monument; its great hall, with the vaulting supported by rows of columns, the ribbing of which is twisted into spirals of extreme lightness, has an elegance and a brightness rarely seen in Gothic architecture, which is better fitted generally to express melancholy than happiness. It is in the Lonja that in Carnival time take place entertainments and masked balls.

The real attraction of Valencia is its population, or, to speak more accurately, that of the surrounding Huerta. The Valencian peasants wear a strangely characteristic costume, which cannot have changed much since the Arab invasion, and which is but slightly different from the peasant costume of African Moors. It consists of a shirt, loose trousers of coarse linen held by a red sash, a waistcoat of green or blue velvet, adorned with buttons made of silver coins; the legs are provided with a sort of knemids, or gaiters, of white wool with a blue tape border, which leave the instep and the foot bare. On their feet they wear alpargatas, or sandals of plaited cords, the sole of which is about an inch thick, and which are fastened on by ribbons like the Greek cothurn. They usually have their heads shaved in Oriental fashion and envelop them in bandanas of brilliant colours. Over the bandana is placed a small, low-crowned hat with turned-up brim, adorned with velvet, tufts of silk, spangles, and shining ornaments. A piece of striped stuff, called capa de muestra, adorned with rosettes of yellow ribbons and thrown over the shoulder, completes this noble and characteristic costume. Within the corners of his capa, which he arranges in a thousand different ways, the Valencian keeps his money, his bread, his water-melon, and his navaja; it serves him at once as a bag and a mantle. Of course we are describing the full costume, the dress worn on feast days. On ordinary days, when working, the Valencian wears little but a shirt and trousers. Then, with his huge black whiskers, his sun-tanned face, his fierce look, his bronzed legs and arms, he looks absolutely like a Bed-

TRAVELS IN SPAIN

ouin, if he unties his bandana and shows his close-shaven blue skull. In spite of Spanish pretensions to Catholicism, it is always difficult for me to believe that these Valencians are not Moslems. It is probably owing to their fierce look that Valencians have the evil reputation which they enjoy in the other provinces of Spain. I was told a score of times that in the Valencian Huerta, if you wished to get rid of any one, there was no difficulty in finding a peasant who would do the job for five or six douros. That strikes me as an absolute slander. I have often met in the countryside most rascally-looking fellows who always bowed to me very politely. One evening we had lost our way, and we finally had to sleep in the open air, the city gates being closed when we returned; and yet nothing happened to us, although it had long been pitch-dark and Valencia and the neighbourhood were in the throes of a revolution.

By a singular contrast, the women of these European Kabyles are pale and fair, like the Venetians; they have a sweet, sad smile and a tender, blue glance. No greater contrast could be imagined. The black demons of the paradise of the Huerta have white angels to wife. Their lovely hair is kept up with a great comb, or traversed with long pins with silver or glass heads. Formerly the Valencian women wore a charming national costume which recalled the Albanian dress; unfortunately, they have given it up for the hideous Anglo-French costume.

We had been for some ten days in Valencia waiting for another steamer, for the bad weather had upset departures and interrupted connections. Our curiosity was sated, and we only cared to return to Paris to see our relatives, our friends, our beloved boulevards; I believe, Heaven forgive me! that I secretly wished to be present at a vaudeville. In a word, civilised life, forgotten for six months, called us back imperiously. We wanted to read the newspapers, to sleep in our own beds, and to indulge a thousand Bœotian fancies. At last there came a steamer from Gibraltar which took us to Port-Vendres, calling at Barcelona, where we remained only a few hours. Barcelona is like Marseilles, and Spanish characteristics are scarcely visible. The buildings are dull and regular, and but for the full blue velvet trousers and the great red caps of the Catalans, one might fancy one's self in France. In spite of the Rambla planted with trees, and its handsome straight streets, Barcelona has a somewhat stiff look, as have all towns closely confined within their fortifications. The cathedral is very handsome, especially the interior, which is sombre, mysterious, and almost terrifying. The organs are of Gothic manufacture, and are enclosed in great painted panels. A Saracen's head grimaces treacherously under the pendentives which support it. Charming coronæ, of the fifteenth century, traceried like reliquaries, hang from the groining of the vault. On leaving the church one enters a beautiful cloister of the same period, dreamy and silent, the half-round arches of which have the gray tones of old Northern buildings.

The street De la Plateria dazzles the eye with its shop windows brilliant with gems, and especially huge earrings as large as bunches of grapes, of heavy, massive richness, somewhat barbaric but quite majestic in effect, which are purchased chiefly by well-to-do peasant women.

The next day, at ten in the morning we were entering the little bay at the foot of which spreads Port-Vendres, — we were in France. Shall I acknowledge it? — as I stepped on my fatherland, tears of regret, not of joy, filled my eyes. The golden towers, the silvery peaks of the Sierra Nevada, the rose laurels of the Generalife, the long, moist, velvet glances, the blooming carnation lips, the small feet, the small hands,—all these came back to my mind so vividly that it seemed to me that France, where I was going to meet my mother, was a land of exile into which I was entering. My dream was ended.
